"THE JEALOUS HUSBAND"

A Truant Hubby gets his Just Deserts

He trumps up a scheme of failing health in order to get away on a fishing trip with the boys. During his sojourn at the fishing shore, his mother is taken seriously ill, and his wife, upon seeking the doctor, finds him also at the seashore, to which she repairs, bringing him back with her in her machine. The husband seeing the doctor and his wife speeding along the road, is thrown into a fury of jealousy and induces for himself sufficient trouble to be more truthful in the future.

Facts and Comments.

At all times in the history of our race there have been large bodies of men, to whom progress and innovation of any kind was distasteful. After these gentry had attained such mental cultivation as the natural soil warranted they always wanted to put up the barriers just at that point and always declared that any thing higher or better would not be understood by the public, they with remarkable modesty assuming to speak for the public. The crisp and racy wit of our people has with characteristic cleverness given these individuals the fitting name of "Pull-backs."

They are not wanting in the realm of moving pictures. They are at home, thoroughly and only at home on the beaten path and any deviation from it excites their fear and incurs their displeasure. They shut their eyes to the progress of the moving picture. They wonder in a pathetically helpless way why the old days, when ten shows on or one or two reel basis were the common rule, have passed and still cherish somewhere in their hearts a hope that these days will return. They make no effort to adjust themselves to new conditions and many of them quit the business with the firm belief that it is going to the dogs in a very short time.

There is a variety of pullbacks in the moving picture field, forever afraid that the film makers aim too high and that the public will not be able to follow. Their pet phrase and argument, which they fondly consider unanswerable is, that the public must never be educated, but just amused and nothing more. They look upon the theory that the moving picture should keep step with the great progressive movement for more light, for a juster conception of life, for a greater love of the artistic and the beautiful as the rankest kind of heresy. They are saturated with the old superstitions of the circus tent and the medicine show. Their overture is, "Well, well, good people, here we are again with the greatest aggregation," and their finale is, "Thanking you one and all for your kind attention, etc."

Their dogma is that man, once he has left school, neither needs nor desires any more knowledge or education, unless he goes to a college or university. The hundreds of noble men and women, who are today devoting their money and themselves to settlement work in the big cities are eloquent and pathetic proof of the contrary. Man in this century is athirst for knowledge. The assumption that because he is poor or compelled by hard daily toil to gain his daily bread, he is no longer capable of higher emotions is as base as it is groundless. The greatest university of today is the moving picture, because its course is always beginning and there are no vacations. No formalities are required for admission and it is open to all.

We are glad to see a kind word printed or spoken for the moving picture, but the patronizing tone of some of the reformers, because it betrays such invincible ignorance, is at times almost irritating. So many of these people talk, as if the possibilities of the moving picture for good, had just been discovered by them and that complete darkness prevailed until they appeared upon the scene. The moving picture has won its way into sound public favor by the sheer force of its merits. We have now come to a pass when the picture is no longer in need of condescension, but can claim respect, as a matter of absolute right.

Fulfillment vindicates the prophet and entitles him to prophesy again. In the summer of 1908 THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD in an article "The Film of the Future," predicted the filming of Shakespeare and Dickens, sketched an outline of historic material for the film maker and ran its pointing finger through the pages of the Bible. Nothing then visible on the surface of filmdom seemed to warrant such optimistic visions. Cheap comedy and hybrid melodrama were running riot, and to many wiseacres the limits of moving picture possibilities seemed to have been reached. It was common to speculate on the probable duration of the moving picture "fad" with the cheerless view of the man who is suddenly thrust into the cold gray dawn. Men noted for their owlish wisdom remarked, that all this talk about the great future of the moving picture was vain and the prophets were urged to descend from the clouds and keep the moles company.

In what industry or invention known in the annals of man has the progress of three brief years produced more revolutionary results than in the world of moving pictures? Printing and photography compared to this have moved at a snail's pace and as to churches and schools the progress, especially in the case of the former, has been equally slow and painful. Not that we wish in the least to underestimate these influences, we know very well that for centuries they prepared the world for the reception and appreciation of this last, but surely not least, of great inventions. The moving picture owes an eternal debt of gratitude to these great humanizing agencies and does not mean to belittle its obligations to them, but that it is destined to supersede some and greatly improve others is not alone the opinion of this paper, but has recently been expressed in plain and forcible style by Edison himself.

Thus emboldened by the logic and rhetoric of plain facts, we venture to predict, that another step upward will be the development of the proper lecture along with the feature film. Within very recent times we have had such films as "Jerusalem Delivered" and Dante's "Divine Comedy." We mention these two, one of them a four and one a five-reel subject, not because they are the only ones of that type now crowding the market, but because the necessity of a lecture with such will be apparent even to a limited intelligence. Go into any theater in this broad land and take an audience a little above the average if you please and then ask yourself: "How many have sufficient knowledge of such subjects to enjoy them without an explanation?" Unless then these wonderful productions, which signify a new departure in moving pictures, which hold out the richest rewards to exhibitors, which will gain for the photoplay new and permanent patronage of a most valuable character and which will once for all silence its enemies and gain their respect, are properly presented they are in danger of "falling flat" and there will come a most deplorable reaction to the lowest and cheapest forms of moving picture entertainments. THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD, which has the welfare of the exhibitor at heart and likes to see him prosperous, cannot help insisting on these points for the benefit of the exhibitor and the moving picture field at large.

The expense in procuring such aids to proper and profitable presentation is merely nominal and bears no proportion to the advantages gained, chief of which are added revenues and added prestige and reputation. Once the exhibitors realize these advantages there will be no doubt about a good supply of lecturers to meet the demand. Never before have the learned professions been crowded as they are today, never has the college-bred man been in such need for a new field of activity. Men of education and some speaking ability are required, for the intelligent public will tolerate no other. To educate a man does not mean to saturate his memory with information from the printed page. In the wider and more modern sense education is the development of the mind, the growth of its power to realize what knowledge is and an ability to group it for the practical purposes of life. Who will say, that in this respect at least the feature film with its sweeping range of subjects, with the explanation of a competent lecturer will not play a most important part in the education of the people? This country issues no patents of nobility except for usefulness. In the ranks of that nobility, which Emerson prophesies, a nobility of service, the man, whose abilities entitle him to lecture on moving pictures, will in the future hold a place of no small importance.

The value of the moving picture as an aid to science is incalculable. In every one of the exact sciences the moving picture is the supreme teacher. Experiments of great importance in chemistry, botany, surgery, physics, now witnessed by hundreds will through the picture be made accessible and valuable to millions. Exchanges, managed by scientists in the interest of science, will be established in the near future, and the reel of film will in every way be the peer of the textbook and of the literature of the specialists. "Sciences taught by moving pictures" will at no distant date supplant the now so popular teaching "by mail.'

Titles are important things on the screen, and very often they sustain and explain the picture better than the action itself. It is therefore astonishing that in so vital a matter some manufacturers, both foreign and domestic, show a shocking degree of carelessness. Titles should not only be brief, but also plain, simple, clear and put in English which the average patron of the moving picture theatre can easily understand. Instead of that, some very good reels are often marred by bad grammar, bad spelling, and English that seems to have been translated with the aid of a dictionary and a crow-bar. The other day we looked at a magnificent film of foreign make, in the course of which we were startled by the following title: "The Imam takes the Ikon to the Soldan." The audience gasped. We do not believe that one man in the seven hundred of the audience had the slightest idea what an Imam was, and but few realized the meaning of Ikon and Soldan. It may have been part of a Turkish menu or a Russian prayer book; but whatever it was, it looked sadly out of place as a supposedly English title in a moving picture film. We could multiply instances, but let this be enough for the present. We suggest to all film-makers to pay due attention to titles and have them censored as to their English by a competent scholar.

Mr. Edison in a recent interview spoke of the possibility of recording chemical reactions in moving pictures. Such an application of the cinematograph to scientific acts and experiments would be of the greatest possible aid to criminal jurisprudence. In all cases where death is claimed to have resulted from the administering of poison, well-known chemical tests with certain chemical agents are made by experts who are then called upon the stand to give their testimony. We know that this expert testimony has led to great abuses and has often resulted in miscarriages of justice. The floods of technical terms thrown at laymen jurors was confusing in the extreme. Men who did not know the elementary principles of chemistry were suddenly called upon to grasp the meaning and process of chemical tests. If moving pictures were made of these tests and reactions the jurors could understand much better, the hypothetical question would lose its importance and a more intelligent and just verdict would be rendered.

Kinemacolor Exhibition

Much has been written in the columns of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD touching the technical side of this great invention and no doubt the student of light and color can see things in the natural colors on the screen, which are not discernible by the mere spectator. However, it requires no special training in science to appreciate and welcome the reproduction of natural colors in moving pictures. The impression of the plain untrained beholder is really of the greatest importance of all, for he represents the general public.

A number of pictures in natural colors, the results of the Urban-Smith process, were shown to some specially invited guests at the offices of the Kinemacolor Company of America, at 145 West 45th Street, this city, on June 30. It was not the first exhibition of its kind, but surely not the least interesting. Some of the pictures lent themselves to an effective reproduction of natural colors and left an impression on eye and mind, wholly different from the ordinary black and white photography. One of the most striking of the pictures exhibited was "The Investiture of the Prince of Wales with the Garter." The gray of the ancient castles at Windsor brought out with all the greater effect the splendor of the pageantry, which of course constitutes the chief charm and merit of the picture. In fact the chief title to reality in this and similar pictures unquestionably is derived from the natural colors, so faithfully reproduced. The same holds true of the dazzling series of panoramas called the "Festival of the Empire." In this picture the King of England and numerous other notable and distinguished personages could be plainly seen, for the divinity that doth hedge a king about does not in these enlightened days screen him from the operations of the man with the moving picture camera. "The Unveiling of the Monument to Queen Victoria" showing the King and Queen of England and the Emperor and Empress of Germany in the procession to the statue followed next, and it was interesting to note the difference in the manner, with which the Emperor and the King answered the popular acclamations, George affably and smilingly, William stiffly and sternly. One notices even such things much more plainly in a natural color reproduction, because the whole picture seems more bright and its details appear to stand out somewhat more distinctly. It may have been merely the novelty of the thing, but it did appear to the writer as if the natural colors were more soothing to the eye and involved less of a strain.

Other pictures shown were the launching of the Olympic, the white and red of the huge vessel forming a striking contrast to the bright green of the water and "Bathing at Ostend." The bright hues of the bathing suits, the sharp changes of white and green on the little bathing houses along the strand, the various colors in the dresses of the women spectators gave the picture all and more than the vividness of a painting because the painting does not move.

The exhibition altogether would have been better described by using the words "moving paintings" instead of "moving pictures."

A Great Epic in Moving Pictures.

TASSO'S "JERUSALEM DELIVERED" IN FOUR REELS.

This is the second great epic in films, that has come to us from Italy, the "Fall of Troy" having been the first. The chief elements of the epic poem are the heroic theme, the heroic figure, an abounding in scenes, incidents and episodes and a splendor of description. The action, while it must of course possess coherence and dramatic force, is never rapid and its connection with the general matter of the poem may often be only indirect or loose and superficial. It may therefore at first glance seem, that the epic poem is but little adapted for rendition in moving pictures and the ordinary film maker may well and wisely turn away in pursuit of a cheaper theme.

To the wider and keener vision of the ambitious and competent artist, however, appear along with the problems, the vast possibilities of the epic as a moving picture. He sees a new field, rich beyond hope and as yet wholly undeveloped. He realizes that he has found a new departure for the moving picture and that into the higher and harder paths, which he has chosen to tread, but few will be able or anxious to follow. The undoubted success of the "Fall of Troy" is a conclusive proof of the rich rewards, which the classic epic bestows upon the manufacturer, who commands the experience, the artistic taste, the scholarship and enterprise, indispensable to such success.

The inspiration of the "Fall of Troy" was Homer's "Iliad" and the great work of Tasso has not inaptly been termed the "Christian Iliad." Indeed there is a striking similarity in the choice of the theme. In the Homeric Iliad Greek heroes besieged and conquered Troy, in the story of Tasso Christian warriors besiege and conquer Jerusalem. It is difficult for us in this age and land to realize the existence of a world-wide, spiritual movement, which had for its object nothing more and nothing less than the achievement of an ideal. A little less than a thousand years ago the whole Christian world was thrilled by the preaching of a simple monk, who urged the warriors of Christian Europe to march into the holy land and redeem Jerusalem from the rule of the Moslems. Various crusades followed, but the one, which Tasso chose for the subject of his great creation, had for its central figure Godfrey of Bouillon. After many hardships and vicissitudes the Christian warriors at last accomplished their holy design and Jerusalem passed for a short time under Christian control. Around this sublime but simple theme Tasso has woven a mass of minor stories and plots with a grandeur of diction and description, rarely equaled and surpassed by Homer alone.

The epic is divided into twenty books, loosely held together by the main story and at times quite diffuse and purely descriptive. The first problem for the film maker was therefore one of elimination. It was necessary to throw out numerous scenes and incidents and then to build up a plot, which would go well on the screen, preserve all the dramatic beauty and power of Tasso and avoid complicating the main story with any of the minor scenes and episodes. The key to success, however, was in arranging the settings, which in the film correspond in importance to the descriptions in the poem. It is due to the film maker to say, that in this respect he did the utmost that lies in the power of human art and skill and it is this feature, which without much further aid, would secure popular admiration of the work. The four reels are absolutely free from any taint of cheapness in this respect. The attention to details is little short of marvelous. Armors and costumes, both of the Christians and the Saracens, the interior and exterior of the palaces, mosques, tents, the staging of the camps are simply beyond all praise. The burning of the besieging towers of the crusaders, the armed conflicts between the hostile armies, the retreat of the Moslem army into Jerusalem, the battle on the walls of the city, the final victory of the Christians, the burning of the mosque, the fighting in the streets, the preaching of Peter the Hermit had all the impressiveness of realism and will win the plaudits of any audience. One or two scenes, however, cannot in justice be passed over with merely a brief reference. As a spectacle of convincing dramatic power nothing could possibly surpass the scenes before the palace of the Sultan Aleddin, when the decree of death against the Christians of Jerusalem is read to the people. Nothing is quite so difficult as to obtain satisfactory results with a scene, the success of which must in large measure depend on the action of a mob or a large assembly of people. As a rule we see a lot of ill-trained supers rushing about, trying by all sorts of antics to convince the stage manager that they are trying to earn their money. Here every member of the crowd acts with intelligence and to some purpose and the result on the spectator, as despair seizes the Christians, is overpowering. When out of the panic-stricken multitude Sophronia, the Christian girl, struggles to reach the platform, on which the Turkish officials stand and accuses herself of the theft of the picture from the mosque a situation of extraordinary force is attained, which reaches a heart-gripping climax, when Olindo points to himself as the thief.

The appearance of supernatural agencies on the modern stage is frowned upon and rarely tolerated even in the work of noted playwrights. Tasso's epic derives no small part of its charm and power from the plottings of the powers of darkness against the success of the Christian cause. To have eliminated all of this play by sprites and demons would have meant a serious loss to the spectator; to indulge it to the extent, which was permissible to the poet, would have been tiresome. Again the film maker showed his fine artistic temperament by taking and working out with splendid skill what was suitable and valuable and passing by the rest. Rinaldo's adventure in the enchanted forest, first with the evil spirit and then the tempting nymphs, is portrayed with a combination of delicacy and power, altogether too infrequent in the handling of such scenes. A word must likewise be said about the duel between the Mohammedan maiden Clorinda, the most charming feminine character in the entire epic, and the brave Tancred. Ordinarily such an incident would have left an audience indifferent, for these photoplay duels are all cast in the same mould. Here, however, as in every other part of the four reels, we witness the painstaking care of the conscientious artists. Every detail had been most cleverly arranged and carried out and much time must have been taken with rehearsals to give such a perfect production. The duel scene is one of the finest in the whole picture. By far the greater part of the action and the more descriptive scenes in the films take place in the open air in the more or less immediate vicinity of Jerusalem. With a touch of historic truth and realism, which characterizes perhaps better than any other single circumstance, the high artistic plane on which the entire production stands, all the scenes are either sandy wastes or stony wilderness or rocky heights. Such is indeed the actual topography of the modern as it was that of the ancient Jerusalem.

The characters in Tasso's epic are its greatest strength and charm. They are indeed cast in the genuine heroic mould and to reproduce them without losing an iota of their described greatness was a task worthy of a master of the art. The characters are played with consummate dramatic skill and power. Such indeed as we see him in these reels of pictures was the Godfrey of history and poetry, a figure of noble manhood, consecrated to a lofty ideal, a devout follower of Christ, a redoubtable warrior, a true leader of men. In the last scene, where he appears before the victorious hosts with the emblem of the crusaders, refusing to wear a crown in the city where his Saviour was crowned with thorns, he gives an impression of sincerity and dignity, which inspires the audience with something akin to awe and reverence. Rinaldo, the fearless impulsive knight, who was tempted and fell, and at last breaking away from the toils of his sweet enchantress reappears in the Christian camp, repents and is received by Godfrey, is a lovable part throughout and gains a great hold not only on the admiration, but also on the affections of the audience. The same is true of the noble Tancred, who in the scene where he baptizes the wounded Turkish maiden Clorinda, displays histrionic talent of a very high order. Clorinda and Armida are the only feminine characters of importance in the story and no word of praise given to either can be too enthusiastic. Physically they are both perfect types of womanhood. The earnestness of their acting must impress every one. Clorinda plays the part of the Amazon on the Mohammedan side, she has cast off the finery of her sex and hides her charms under the heavy suit of mail, until Tancred in a most affecting scene fatally wounds her and learns her sex. Though possessed of all the martial ardor of the Maid of Orleans, she has a heart as tender as it is brave and her interference in the carrying out of the death sentence against Sophronia and Olindo is one of the sublime moments in the film. With equal perfection is played the part of Armida, the sorceress and queen of Antioch.

It is necessary with all these splendid points of merit to criticise a few minor blemishes, which could very easily have been avoided. The angel Gabriel, which in the first reel appears to Godfrey, is disappointing. If the description of Tasso had been followed no such blunder could have been made. The gate of Jerusalem, shown in the various parts of the production, is of wood, while in the poem, the gates are described as fortified "with mighty bars of long enduring brass" and Aleddin goes to the "steel-bound doors and iron gates."

In summing up it must be said, that the only danger to the great success which this production so amply deserves, arises from the inability of the ordinary audience to fully understand and enjoy the reels. Tasso's poem, though admittedly one of the very few great epics in the literature of the world, is in its details known to but comparatively few and some of the very finest parts in the film would without an explanation be meaningless and go for naught. The sub-titles as they stand today are badly spelled and badly put together and a hindrance rather than a help. Unless there is some medium through which the full worth of the work can pass from the screen to the audience, much of this precious and noble effort is in great peril of being lost. Happily there is a bridge to span this chasm and that is the lecture with music and suggestion.

Does It Pay To Be "Funny?"

By William H. Kitchell.

According to a recent observation of the "Man About Town," there is "big money" awaiting the writer who can invent photoplays that are comedies. "Good comedies can command good prices." They can—but they don't. And again: "The dearth of comedy is again, or still, the cry. There is a reason." There is—and a good one.

It is necessary to be personal enough to remark that the writer is enough of an ass as to write moving picture scenarios for a side-issue. The fact is admitted ruefully. Somehow there is a fascination about the speculation that draws one back to the stamped envelope and the inevitable rejection-slip. Monte Carlo and Wall Street are mere bagatelles compared with scenario writing. Indeed, if there were little else in life but orange blossoms, immortelles, and the ten and fifteen-dollar checks which drop occasionally into the picture-playwright's pocket from the charitable hand of a film manufacturer, the game would still be worth the candle. We are all born gamblers at heart.

Furthermore, the writer is an inventor of alleged comedy. It is true that there is a fair demand for humorous scenarios. They are the easiest of all to sell; and the inventor who cannot dispose sooner or later, of fifty per cent. of his "funny stuff" has no "call" to the business. The writer has averaged higher, with several fair plots to be heard from and more than one poor one sold. Perhaps, in a microscopic way, he has a "reputation." When you get a "reputation," you get a letter once in awhile from several scenario editors asking to hurry up a particular brand of comedy, as the Comedy Director has a "bug on" for elopement stories, or vice versa. Then you fill the bill and send on the manuscript, and about four months later it comes back with a note stating that there is "no demand for the enclosed type of story. Send us something different."

And other privileges go with the "reputation." If you have a sufficient supply of nerve, you send back a five-dollar check or two with a note stating that you are now getting $20 apiece for your comedies, and that you decline to undersell. Really there are manufacturers, both Licensed and Independent, who pay the extraordinary sum of $20 for a live comedy scenario. It seems incredible, but the writer can prove the fact by his cash-book. He has also received checks on a few red-letter occasions, for $35 and slightly more; but with one exception these were for dramas, not comedies. And from all but one company he was a long time getting the $20. One scenario was taken by a reputable manufacturer for $8, including a detailed scene-plot and a synopsis; and moreover the farce made a "hit," handicapped as it was by its cash value.

It is necessary again to be personal enough to remark that the writer is an ass. If he had been human, he would have returned the eight dollars.

At present the "big money" goes to the mechanic who probably needs it most—to the hard-working Comedy Director who revamps the comedies that have been "done before" and slides the second-hand machine work upon a disgusted photoplay public. There is no "dearth of comedy." Not of the average photoplay variety. There will be none, so long as one alleged "comedy" plot can be worked seven times in six months, with variations, by one Director of Comedy whose name and business address the writer will forward cheerfully and free gratis to any reputable assassin.

Not but what there are Comedy Directors who are above hack-work, and exceptions from the category.

But "does it pay to be funny?"

Is twenty dollars an adequate recompense for an original comedy? Despite the fact that they are easier to get rid of than an average drama or melodrama, they are vastly harder to write. For one really humorous plot suggestion that arises in the scenario writer's mind, he can think of a dozen dramas or Western plays worthy of production. The proof can be found in the photoplay houses. How many new and original picture comedies have been released by film manufacturers during 1911?

And few of the few of the originals were written by the salaried writers employed by the manufacturers.

The day will come when the manufacturer will wake to the fact that a new comedy "situation" is worth more to an outside writer than the check he can draw from the studios. The same amount of "reputation" that will enable a writer to demand $20 for a comedy scenario, will enable him to demand from two to four cents a word for the same material in short-story form. And for every picture manufacturer using outside contributions, there are fifty magazines and periodicals, all of which would go out of commission in three months without an available supply of unsolicited articles and stories. This is why most of the story writers go back to the magazines after a "try" at the pictures—and why the manufacturer continues to advertise in the writers' "trade papers" that he is paying from $10 to $100 for photoplay plots.

If there is a demand for comedy for the photoplays, there is a wider demand for "funny stuff" from the Sunday newspaper and the periodicals. The writer pleads "not guilty"—but he knows of a newspaper worker who worked a live humorous "situation" once a week for three months in one Sunday newspaper, and then repeated the stunt some months later in another periodical. And he got a living salary for the work; which is more than the photo playwright gets.

There are new, live, and amusing comedy plots in the brains of the average man who can appreciate and originate a "joke," but there will be few in the photoplays until the manufacturers offer sufficient encouragement for the budding scenario writer to dig into his imagination and write. Life means labor for the most of us who are not moving picture manufacturers or Comedy Directors, and we sell our work to the best market.

For it does not pay to be a live and original photo playwright for the picture manufacturers.

"Dante's Inferno."

An explanation is due to our readers in regard to apparently conflicting announcements of the film "Dante's Inferno." It appears that there are two of these productions now available to the American public. One, by the Helios Company, of Italy, is in two reels, and is highly commended by the foreign press. This is now being marketed by B. E. Clements (see advt. on page 82.) The other and more elaborate visualization of Dante's poem is in five reels. It more closely follows the famous illustrations of Gustave Doré, and is said to be the most elaborate and impressive film ever made. It is not yet clear who will exploit the Milano film in this country. Sig. Lombardo, in Rome, who is said to own the rights for the whole world in the Milano production, entered into a contract with the representative of an American company for the exclusive rights for this country and Canada. On the same day his authorized agent, in Naples, made a similar contract, only on different terms, with representatives of another American company. To the layman both contracts appear to be valid and both concessionaires equally sure of their rights. Both claimants have retained counsel and the outcome will be watched with interest. Meanwhile the Helios film will have a run for first money, but this should not detract from the value of the Milano production. To the contrary, the excellence of the first should exalt the value and increase the demand for the latter, which, we are informed, represents almost two years' work of the best Italian artists and artistes.

Items of Interest.

With unshaken faith in the stability of the Moving Picture and as evidence of his belief that they are here to stay, Lyman H. Howe, lecturer and traveler and dean of moving picture exhibitors, has put into effect a remarkable new and original scheme and one which will undoubtedly prove a feature of vital importance to the industry, especially from an educational standpoint. The plan is to compile a moving picture history, a collection of films showing prominent and notable characters, scenes of interest and notable places of the time. These pictures are now being taken in various parts of the country and will be stored away in their department at Wilkesbarre, Pa., each film to be placed in a glass case, with a typewritten description and explanation and sealed with a stamp reading: "Not to be opened for one hundred years." Thus the posterity of the present century will view the history of national progress from the moving picture screen, and can but have full confidence in its reliability and accuracy.

The newly constructed Northwestern railroad depot, one of the most majestic structures in the city, is the first scene to be taken for the Howe library, in Chicago. It was taken several days ago by the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company and will shortly find its way among the notables. This idea, which will culminate in a library of great value not only to historians, but to the country in general, was originated by Mr. Bosworth, who represents Mr. Howe on the road, and well may credit be awarded him.

A meeting was held recently in Hamburg, Germany, under the direction of Herr J. Henschel, to protest against the almost crushing taxation to which cinematograph theater proprietors are subjected. In the course of the meeting attention was drawn to the fact that all over Germany opera houses and other great theaters were not only free from taxation, or only subjected to slight taxation on the grounds that such entertainments were for the good of the people as a whole, but even received state assistance. Nevertheless, in spite of the immense benefit the poorer classes were undeniably receiving in the way of healthy amusement and education, in a form easy to be assimilated, every effort was being made by local bodies to crush picture theaters out of existence. In the case of unstamped tickets being issued by mistake, the proprietor might find himself sentenced to six years' imprisonment in default of payment of a fine of 10,000 marks.

Just about the time, when man yields to the fond belief, that he is the real lord of creation, lovely woman comes along and shatters the illusion into smithereens. She has again scored over mere man by enlisting the moving picture in her quest for the right to vote. Their latest device for furthering her ends in England has taken the form of a photoplay, entitled "True Womanhood." It is said to be a thriller from Thrillersville. The exhibitors are to be urged to show the film and are to be tempted by the promise of a large number of the warring sisterhood in case of compliance. Of course the married exhibitors will be largely influenced by their wives and enjoy in this matter at least a distinct advantage over their bachelor brethren.

The International Film Traders' Company, of No. 5 West 14th Street, has scored a most creditable victory by having the reel depicting the scenes at the coronation of King George V and Queen Mary ready for the New York lovers of moving pictures as early as last Friday, June 30th. The film, which had been consigned to the I. F. T. Company on board the "Mauretania" was exhibited for the first time in America on the day mentioned at the Unque Theater on Fourteenth Street.

Beginning Monday, July 31st, the Vitagraph Company will releases five films each week: Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Friday and Saturday. Two comedies, one Western, one military, and one straight drama.

Reviews of Notable Films

JIMMIE ELOPES.

Reviewed by Jas. S. McQuade.

Among George Kleine's latest importations is a mirthful comedy, of full reel length, entitled "Jimmie Elopes." The delight which this talented boy actor has created in the minds of hundreds of thousands of picture lovers has endeared him to as many hearts, and his latest escapade will doubtless be viewed by many through eyes that will brim with tears of laughter.

But Jimmie is made of such chivalrous stuff that he would not, if he could, attract all attention to himself in this entertaining, silent drama. The tiny girl tot, who casts her lot with him in the early morning flight from home, will also occupy a prominent place in the estimation of all who view the film. She is a dainty little Miss, with a naive, clinging tenderness at times, that wreathes one's face in smiles; but, on occasion, she can assume an imperious air and stand unmoved by the most urgent entreaties of her companion. It is a treat indeed, to see these clever children act their parts. And it is all so natural. They are just living the roles—not one false gesture nor sign of self-consciousness.

That scene in the rectory, where the children appear before the good father and request that he marry them, has all the artistic grouping and detail of a great painting. The first part of the scene (before the child elopers appear), showing four clergymen in rehearsing sacred music, is a masterpiece of photography and toning. The figures seem to stand out in relief and the facts clearly reflect the emotions of the moment. I cannot remember having previously viewed a scene that remains with me so persistently as this one, owing to its powerful, artistic appeal. Jimmie and Alice are next door neighbors. Alice is motherless and lives, without brother or sister, to relieve the motony of home life, with a grouchy father. Jimmie is blessed with a father and mother, who look on him as the apple of their eyes. The sharp eyes of Jimmie soon discover the sadness of the life of little Alice, and at times he persuades his mother to invite her as a guest. One morning the father of Alice is particularly unkind, and orders her to sweep the rooms and hallway, shaking her roughly as he gives the command. Jimmie learns of it and immediately invites her to have breakfast with him.

In the meantime the father returns and flies into a rage on finding that his instructions have not been obeyed. He is still more angry when he discovers that Alice is the guest of his neighbors, and there is a scene between him and the mother of Jimmie, after which the boy is admonished to keep away from Alice. But Jimmie is of sterner mould and, at the first opportunity, he seeks Alice, who acquaints him with her woes, among the latter being a sound spanking, administered with unspairing hand. The climax has been reached and Jimmie is equal to the occasion. He proposes a meeting at midnight, on the roof, where they will be safe from prying eyes. The attic windows, Jimmie reminds Alice, will enable them to get together and consider the plan that he has in mind. The midnight hour has tolled and we catch sight of Jimmie's head as the attic window is raised. Soon Alice is seen. And now Jimmie shows that he is a good judge of human nature and that he possesses wise foresight. Suspecting that Alice has been sent to bed supperless, and knowing that courage is fostered by a full stomach, he had provided bread and wine for her. These he quickly passes to her, on finding that he had guessed rightly, and then proposes that they elope. He requests her to return to her room and fill the void places, after which she is to await his return to the roof with the necessary ropes for their descent to the street. It is a novel sight to witness the young elopers descend for three stories by means of a rope, an athletic feat that will make many wonder. They gain the sidewalk and hurry off. Meantime, two police officers come along and espy the rope. Burglary, or some other crime is suspected, and they climb up to the roof. Then we see them in the sleeping room which Alice had just left and where her father lies in deep slumber. The officers take him for a burglar and rush him off to prison.

While this is happening, Jimmie and Alice are looking for a clergyman. They arrive at the residence of one, but the bell is fixed so high that Alice is obliged to hold Jimmie up while he tries to reach it. He finally succeeds and they are ushered into the presence of the good father and his brother clergymen. We can see that Jimmie's manliness captures his new found friends, and the surprise and smiles on their benevolent faces are a good sight to see, when he explains the object of his visit. After some time the reverend fathers learn the children's story and the location of their homes. Refreshments are then furnished the weary elopers and they are accompanied to their parental roofs by the rector. The date of release of "Jimmie Elopes" will be announced later.

THE MEXICAN JOAN OF ARC (Kalem).

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

The great empire to the south of us has often in the past been the theater of bloody and stirring events, but its annals hold no record of a more truly elemental tragedy than is told in this silent drama. It is a true story, well attested by the Mexican press and authentic American news dispatches. A plain woman of the people, content to be nothing more than a faithful wife and loving mother is suddenly plunged into a fearful anxiety for the lives of her husband and sons. President Diaz, bold in his youth, resolute in his prime and bloody in his old age, suspecting like the half-mad emperors of old Rome danger where there was no danger, causes through his "jefe politico" the arrest of Talamantes and his two sons. They are torn from the bosom of their family and rushed to a "cortel," nominally a court of justice, but as a matter of fact nothing but a legal convenience for the designs of the despot. The dictator's tool, one Zefas, is drunk, when Talamantes and his sons are arraigned before him and even in his drunken mood he condemns father and sons to death. The sentence is promptly carried out, even while the wife and mother pleads for mercy or delay with the drunken military judge. The halting utterances of the judge make her understand the frightful truth, that she is a widow and a twice-bereaved mother. The widow swears to be avenged upon Zefas and his master and becomes indeed the Nemesis of the wretched Zefas and contributes not a little to the success of the insurrection and the dethronement and the thinly disguised flight of the tyrant Diaz. Such in very few words is the story.

It possesses a tragic power greater than that of "Joan of Arc." The latter was impelled by patriotism, moved by heavenly visions to come to the aid of her king. It was not the woman, not the sweetheart, wife or mother that was stirred within her when she confronted Talbot and Saulsbury, but the Frenchwoman, the loyal subject of the French king. As a motive for action, patriotism, however laudable, cannot for a moment compare with the far deeper and more primitive and elemental emotion of wife's and mother's love. A woman roused and determined and spurred on by the wrongs she has suffered as a wife and mother rises at once to heroic size in the eyes of any audience and gives the play a power and dignity, which it would otherwise not possess. The widow Talamantes cared nothing about the insurrection in itself, she uses the insurrection as a means to an end and thereby lifts the whole story into a higher plane of dramatic force and interest. What must otherwise have been a common tale of war and politics now becomes a tragedy in the truest sense of that word.

There is so much other merit in this film, as will appear presently, that it would rise above the level of the ordinary, even if the part of the widow Talamantes had not been taken by a competent and gifted artist. As a matter of fact, however, the actress, Jane Wolf, who essayed this difficult rôle, measured up to every inch of her responsibilities. Her great test came with the scene in the "cortel federal," which she entered as a half-broken, pleading woman and left a few minutes afterwards like a very goddess of vengeance, "filled to the top with direst cruelty." None but a chosen votary of the histrionic art could have done the work she accomplished. When the awful truth at last dawned upon her and she realized that husband and sons were dead she manifested in all her despair and fury that control and poise, which is of the essence of art. Her oath of vengeance was a consummate piece of acting. All other characters in the play were of course subordinated to that of the widow Talamantes, but whatever she needed of capable support was well supplied by the rest of the company. The latter, it must be specially mentioned, were not the regular Kalem players, but all Mexicans, half-breeds and Indians. How much more eloquent the Southern races are with their faces and their hands and fingers than we of more Northern origin was again illustrated in the course of this reel and it was a most pleasant relief to see real Mexicans, real half-breeds and real Mexican Indians after the caricatures that nightly parade through the films of the cheaper sort.

The play possesses an uncommon historic value, first because it deals with an authentic contemporaneous event, and second, because it shows us the real Mexico as it exists to-day. All the pictures were taken on Mexican soil in the very neighborhood in which the actual scenes in the tragedy, as reported by the newspapers, had taken place. It is a way of teaching history and geography which cannot be surpassed. For such an education, conveyed in such manner children and grown people will alike be thankful. We know to-day but little more than our grandfathers about the land of the "conquistadores," but with the modern moving picture this will soon be changed.

One word more about the last scene. When vengeance has been wreaked on Zefas the title tells us, and so does without words the widow Talamantes: "Now I will go back to my people." It is a fine dramatic conclusion, which no audience can fail to perceive and appreciate.

THE VEIL OF HAPPINESS (Pathe).

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

The veil of happiness in this play is the hazy film, which covers the eye of the blind. While this "dim suffusion" lasts the mandarin feeds his hungry heart with fond illusions and goes through life deceived, it is true, but not unhappy. His eyes, so long quenched by envious vapors, are opened to the light by the mysterious liquor given him by the sorcerer. Boundless at first is his gratitude to the source and giver of all light. Too soon, however, he finds that the son, whom, while blind, he had regarded as dutiful, mocks and despises him and that the wife, in whom his sightless orbs had trusted, was a faithless wanton. He now curses the belated gift of vision and following the direction in the socerer's written advice he, by using ten instead of three drops, voluntarily destroys his sight and returns to the darkness, in which he had been fondly and foolishly contented.

This is the skeleton of the story, which the Pathes have decked out with a beauty of color and a power of acting, that form a true feature film. It is well known that in colorded pictures this French firm has long had a decided lead, but in the present reel they surely surpass even their own records. The settings both natural and artificial are worthy of a cleverer pen than mine, I doubt whether even Lafcadio Hearn could do them justice. With good projection and good light and moderate speed these pictures will seem like so many paintings from gifted hands, "a dream of picture galleries or a picture gallery of dreams." The scene beside the pagoda, where the wretched Tschang sees his wife accept the attentions of a lover, the corner of the Chinese town where the blind man is cured by the sorcerer were all too short; they were gone, before the delighted eye could drink in all their beauties.

Gorgeous settings, rich dresses and costumes, bewitching scenery do not, however, constitute the greatest merits of this play. Its particular title to public admiration is the acting of the artist, who takes the part of the blind mandarin. His was indeed a most exacting task. In the spoken drama even it requires, as a rule, a certain amount of time to develop an intense situation. Here a few moments led up to the crisis of the play and then the actor had to picture in rapid succession the emotions of extreme joy and hope and of extreme grief and despair. Nor did his task end here. Up to now there was but little to distinguish the story from many others of the same kind, we only mention Gaumont's "The Blind Man of Jerusalem," released more than two years ago. The peculiar merit and moral and dramatic strength of the film lies in its strange conclusion. Tschang has two courses open to him after the discovery of the deceit practiced upon him; either he must tell the wife and son of what he has seen and denounce and punish them, or bear his misfortune in silence. He decides to bear his great sorrow in silence and to return into darkness. Voluntarily he deprives himself of the sight, so briefly enjoyed. He goes on receiving the feigned homage of son and wife with apparent pleasure and rather than put them to shame he carries his misery through life with him. It may be objected, that the blind mandarin offends against the probabilities of human nature and that his virtue is perhaps the refuge of weakness rather than triumphant self-sacrifice. However, that may be a critic must never forget that in moving pictures as in literature, truth is sometimes stranger than fiction, and as played by the actor there seemed nothing improbable in the ending. The end of the play is in any event full of dramtic force and the picture as it disappears from the screen leaves a little conflict of emotions in every heart—a thing much to be desired in a drama, which is otherwise unexceptionable.

FOREIGN NOTES OF INTEREST.

The English press and pulpit are fulminating against alleged exhibitions of obscene moving pictures before so-called aristocratic audiences. Nobody seems to know just where the bad films come from, but London makers are freely exonerated by the press. The exhibitions seem to have been given in secret and everybody connected with them seems to be thoroughly ashamed of the affair. The regrettable feature is a new outburst in certain newspapers against pictures generally.

A certain editor of a newspaper in Leipzig, Germany, had for some time amused himself by printing all sorts of disagreeable things about an exhibitor of moving pictures, holding the poor man up to contempt and ridicule and immensely enjoying the performance. At last the worm—meaning the exhibitor—turned and had the aforesaid editor haled into court for defamation. The court, learning that the assertions of the editor were totally false, imposed a fine with the alternative of imprisonment.

Copyrighting a Scenario.

By George Rockhill Craw

In order to protect yourself against piracy during that period in the sale of a scenario when it is being hawked about the country to the various producers, lying about on the desks of scenario editors, etc., have you ever sent a copy of it to the Register of Copyrights at Washington, with an application for the entry of same, so as to obtain copyright protection?

If so, you have probably received a letter from the Register, stating that your application, manuscript, and the fee of $1.00 have been received. The letter has also probably stated that "the copyright law does not make any provision for a 'scenario,' by name. A scenario is subject to entry as a 'book,' as the description of a motion picture, like the description of anything else, might be a book. In the case of books, no entry can be made until they have been printed and published with the statutory notice of copyright, and two copies of the best edition so published, deposited in this office. I therefore return the scenario to you herewith. If you will send to this office one complete typewritten or manuscript copy of the drama, your copyright claim may be entered. Pending your prompt response, I will hold your application and remittance of $1.00."

Upon receiving this letter, you have, of course, at once dismissed the proposition of publishing the scenario as a book in order to have it copyrighted. The expense would probably be almost as great as the price you would receive for the scenario if you should be able to sell it.

A certain author who writes scenarios for motion picture production, upon receiving the letter in question, sought to avail himself of the letter's alternative proposition, i. e., "If you will send this office one complete typewritten or manuscript copy of the drama, your copyright claim may be entered." By the word "drama," the Registrar means a complete dramatic composition, with dialogue, a scenario being merely the general outline of same.

The author, believing that pantomimes were copyrightable without dialogue, merely changed the title of his scenario MS. so that it read, "A Pantomimic Dramatic Composition," these words appearing immediately after the title proper. He again sent the original scenario, with this little change, to the Register, stating that while the manuscript had the appearance of a scenario, it was a complete pantomimic dramatic composition, inasmuch as nothing further need be added to permit a finished pantomimic theatrical production to be made from it, and on this ground he asked that copyright entry be made at once.

The Register's reply to this was that the author had sent "some pages of manuscript entitled, 'a pantomimic dramatic composition.' This play has been examined with some care, and the conclusion is difficult to resist that it is a description of either what does appear in a moving picture, or what is going to appear in one. In a pantomime there are no words, but in the manuscript sent by you there are captions which are to be communicated to the audience in some way. There is no way to communicate matter of that sort by a pantomimist. All that he does is simply to act, not to speak, and it is difficult to imagine how these captions can be presented to the audience except by scpoken words, or by the projection on a screen as in the case of moving pictures. Before further action is taken it would seem necessary for you to state distinctly whether this article is intended for production by moving pictures, or in any other way than by action alone performed by a living person on the stage."

By the Register's reference to the "stage," was meant the public stage, before an audience of the public. While the author may have intended the pantomime for the moving picture stage, he could also have intended it for production on the public stage in the form he had written it, if a manager could be found to put it on, and he felt that whether it ever was put on a public stage and acted there by living persons, or not, was no affair of the Register's. So he wrote that official to the effect that the pantomime was intended for a production on the stage by living persons, but that it might also be acted before a moving picture camera.

To this letter the Register replied that "while some pantomimes are really acted but unspoken dramas and entitled to copyright protection as such, not all pantomimes belong to this class, and it is difficult to distinguish them, and still more difficult to determine how registration of a drama wthout words can be made. The question is, what shall be filed as deposit? How is the public to know what you claim on in connection with this pantomime? There is no copyright protection for gestures, tones, or scenery: Keene vs. Kimball (16 Gray 551), and in a pantomime there does not seem to be anything but gestures, tones and scenery. In cases of doubt like this, where the method of procedure is uncertain, it would seem incumbent upon the applicant himself to make clear what means should be taken to secure his rights, if he has any. This office does not mean to be understood as suggesting that some pantomimes cannot be registered, but merely to point out the uncertainty of what ought to be put on record here as deposit to secure your rights." The Register further stated: "Of course, if you write a drama, such drama is entitled to registration, as the law makes it so, and there would be no objection to registering your claim to the drama if the manuscript or printed copy of same were deposited in this office. Perhaps it might be well, if you think proper, for you to rewrite your work so that it will be dramatic both in matter and form."

By the time this letter was received, the author had sold the scenario in question, so that he no longer required copyright protection, although the producer who bought it might then have been interested in copyrighting it to protect himself during the time that the picture for it was being made However, the Register's last letter had cleared the atmosphere somewhat, and because of it the author felt that even if entry should have been made as a pantomime, and this seemed doubtful of attainment, the copyright might not have stood in the face of a contest.

In the future, in order to be able to put the protecting words, "Copyright, 19—, by ——— ———," on his scenarios, and have the entry stand the test of a contest, the author felt that he would have to write them into dramatic form. Brevity was needed, as it would not pay to put much work into the matter of copyrighting a scenario that might bring no more than $25. He figured that a line or two of dialogue added to each scene of a scenario, in connection with the general pantomimic directions of the scenario, would make it dramatic in form.

Nothing that suggested the subtitle of a moving picture scenario must appear in the copy that was to be sent to the Register of Copyrights. Where these substitutes were quotations of what the actors were saying, it was easy enough to write them into the regular dramatic form of dialogue, but the descriptive subtitles offered an obstacle. They were necessary to carry on the thread of the play. It would be hazardous to omit them, and if left as they were, the Register would probably refuse to make an entry of the composition on the ground that it was obviously intended for motion picture production only.

So the author went back to an old device of Shakespeare's and added a character called "Chorus." This character was given, as his lines, the wording of the various descriptive subtitles, the wording of which was unchanged, and which were to be spoken at just the places where they appeared in the scenario, the character appearing and making these announcements between the scenes.

Shakespeare gave various names to "Chorus," such as "Rumor as Chorus," the character being a single actor who would appear between scenes and tell of what was supposed to intervene between them, such as the lapse of time, a war, deaths, a journey, etc. Chorus is used four times by Shakespeare in King Henry V.; Rumor, in Romeo and Juliet; in Winter's Tale, Time, and in Timon of Athens, Gower. Thus the scenario author had the dramatic precendent of centuries and the usage of the greatest of all dramatists back of him.

The author has copyrighted a number of short dramas written from scenarios in this way, the time required being about an hour for the rearrangement, and he of course has the right to put the protecting statutory notice of copyright on the title of his scenarios of the dramas. If another author or a producer should then pirate one of the scenarios so protected, such a person would be liable for a violation of the copright laws, as copyrighted dramas cannot without penalty be made into motion pictures without the consent of the proprietor of the copyright.

Do not think that dramas written briefly as suggested are always at once entered by the Register. But if his objections are met properly he will make the entry and issue the copyright. He will perhaps object to a large number of scenes, but the objection can be overcome by argument in a letter to him stating that the play is in one act and that a one-act drama may have as many scenes as the author wishes, without affecting its status as a drama.

The Register may contend that it is obviously intended for motion pictures. Your argument should be that it is intended for production on the public stage if you can find a producer to put it on there, and that it is also intended for motion pictures if a motion picture producer can be found to produce it that way. Being dramatic in form and intended for the public stage, it is copyrightable.

It is possible the Register may contend that the manuscript is not a drama because it has not a Beginning, a Middle, and an End. You should point out these divisions of your play to him. the Beginning being those scenes in which the Exposition is made, i. e., the facts you have established first in your play familiarizing the audence with the situation, introducing the characters, etc. It is also called the Introduction. The Middle is the Climax or the Clash in the play. The End is the Denouement. As even the most amateur writers have these divisions well marked in their photoplays, it will not be difficult to bring them specfically to the Register's attention.

An hour's time will permit one to rewrite a motion picture scenario into a copyrightable pantomimic drama for the publis stage. The manuscript that is sent to the Register of Copyrights should be described beneath the title line, as "A Drama in Words and Pantomime." This is advised, as most of the drama will be written for pantomime, only enough dialogue being added to make it dramatic in form.

A change in the copyright law making a scenario copyrightable by name should be urged by producers and authors alike Why should not the scenario for a drama be copyrightable in manuscript form just as much as the drama which is to be written from it? Is not an author with the scenario outline of a drama just as much entitled to protection for it in that form as he is when it has been padded out with the dialogue that has been suggested and arranged for in the scenario, and which makes it dramatic in form?

As Register of Copyrights, Mr. Solberg, give the photoplay dramatists a chance to copyright their scenarios conveniently, just as they write them, and if you haven't the power, join them in an effort to secure from Congress the necessary amendment to the copyright law.

A Serious Vaudeville Situation.

And Its Effect on the Motion Picture Industry.

By Robert Grau.

The readers of this periodical are probably informed of the strife now existing between the vaudeville managers of this country, amalgamated to an almost entity on the one hand, and the organization known as "The White Rats of America," representing "the unionized actor," on the other.

The importance, however, of the proceedings now in order and in contemplation are of far greater import to the moving picture industry than is readily conceived, hence the writer is prompted to lay before the most interested people a concise and, he hopes, authoritative recital of this momentous procedure. The moving picture got its first great impetus in the year 1900, from proceedings identically the same as those now casting their shadows before. In this year "The White Rats" society called on the vaudeville managers for the abolition of the "five per cent." that was deducted from the vaudevillians salary. and demanded that this should go to the regular agent only.

The managers declined to negotiate and at a given moment every White Rat walked out of the vaudeville theaters, a state of affairs resulting in a troublous period, wherein the moving picture saved the day for the managers and ultimately brought about the defeat of "The White Rats," though it is doubted if any of the managers regarded their victory with any great joy—in fact, it took one full year before vaudeville resumed its former gait, and the strife has lasted to this day, in various ways and means.

In the eleven years that have elapsed since the "strike" period, the managers have prospered, some becoming millionaires, but in the last two or three years these managers have found their position growing more and more untenable until at the present time they are quite prepared to meet any situation confronting them, and they are now face to face with the most serious problem that they have ever had to cope with. The White Rats have seen their membership grow more than 1,000 per cent. in the last decade, and they now claim ninety per cent. of the vaudeville profession, while in the last ninety days all restriction has been waived in an effort to create a membership of colossal proportions.

"The White Rats" are now affiliated with all of the various labor unions, and the leading figure in its procedure is an Englishman. Harry Mountford by name, who had experience in London in unionizing the actors and also in agitating a strike of tremendous dimensions, the effect of which was unfavorable to the strikers, but by no means a victory for the managers. The present strife consists of the refusal of the managers to recognize or treat with Mountford, who threatens that unless the managers "get together" to adjust the differences with his organization, there will be trouble, and this trouble is presumed to mean that Mountford will call out the vaudeville actors, and through his affiliations with the unions call out all other aids of the managers, such as the orchestra, the stage hands and last, but not least, the audience.

All of the managers have come together, and this being the last week of the ninety day period for receiving new members, "The White Rats" are practically at the war period.

The managers have inserted full-page advertisements in all of the theatrical papers giving their side of the case, thus indicating that the situation is serious enough to justify them in addressing the public.

The managers have emphatically stated that if this strife comes they are prepared for the worst, and that if their houses are closed through inability on their part to provide stage performances, then they will all turn their theaters into straight moving picture houses and keep them ever after as such, and moreover, that they will never employ any of the strikers. It is understood that all of the members are sworn to this policy, and that this country's greatest legal talent is and has been actively engaged in preparing for the strife in whatever form it may take.

It may be but a coincidence, but the vaudeville managers of this country have been taking a vast interest in the forthcoming Kinemacolor pictures, as well as those of the European talking pictures, and it is hardly unlikely, in view of the composition of the syndicates controlling these new inventions, that the managers really are prepared to turn their theaters over to the cameraman.

We are in the vital period of the cinematographic age, and every new development seems merely to aid in the uplift, hence the Keiths, the Percy Williamses, the Hammersteins and the Polis come more vigorously into the field than they now are. So much the better for them. There's a public for the motion picture to meet every demand on it, and if the level is raised the patronage will continue to increase, so that even if all of the theaters now devoted to vaudeville should be added to the exhibiting class, the response from the public will prove the wisdom of the managers in their effort to solve a difficult problem.

News Notes.

Chief of Police John F. Sheridan, who was the cause of the moving picture shows not opening on Sundays in Manchester, Conn., has opened his own picture show, and will operate shows each day and night in the week, including Sunday.

Powderhorn Park and other public parks of Minneapolis, Minn., have been installed with moving pictures. The pictures will deal with history and travel. A few clean comedies will also be shown to amuse the children.

Moving pictures, in connection with illustrated songs, were recently exhibited in an entertainment given by the Napanoch M. E. Church of Napanoch, N. Y. The entertainment consisted of four selected reels of Licensed films. An admission of 25 cents was charged for adults, and 10 cents for children. This is the first time in this vicinity that a moving picture entertainment has been furnished by a church. The films were furnished through the courtesy of the Junior Order of United American Mechanics, who conduct a show every Saturday night for the benefit of the lodge.

Mr. Benjamin Michaels, proprietor of the Royal Palace Motion Picture Theater at Broadway and Dupont Street, San Francisco, Calif., was fined for exhibiting the moving picture entitled "A Dead Man's Honor." The judge pronounced that it was a violation of Section 2 of City Ordinance 76, which forbids the exhibition of films relating to hold-ups and robberies.

The latest one sprung on the film industry is the luring of men and women from "art schools," which is caused by moving picture and vaudeville theaters.

A hot discussion relative to moving pictures is at present in session in Atlanta, Ga. The reformers are not quite sure as to whether they should continue condemning the moving picture theaters from opening on Sunday or allow the proprietors to open and exhibit strictly religious and educational pictures, and collect a percentage of the receipts. One picture theater proprietor, J. A. Robb, of the Superba Theater, at 840 Whitehall Street, issued a statement that if he were allowed to open his theater on the Sabbath Day from 2 o'clock in the afternoon until 10 o'clock at night he would be willing to give a good percentage of his gross receipts to some charitable organization. He proposes to exhibit nothing but films of religious, educational and historical nature, and that all of the music will be on the sacred order.

With the Western Producers.

By Richard V. Spencer, Los Angeles.

Bison.—Mr. Fred J. Balshofer, general manager and chief director of the Bison Stock Company, who has been in New York City the past few months in charge of the Coney Island factory of the company, will return to Los Angeles, July 5th, for a brief visit to make arrangements to see the stock company off on their Northern trip. The Bison Company of forty people will leave Los Angeles about July 10th for Bear Valley, 100 miles north in San Bernardino County, where they will take a number of films. The company will be gone from the Los Angeles studio from three to five months. With the company will be two stock cars full of horses, several more cars of scenery, costumes, properties, and other necessities. The company will not remain in Bear Valley for the entire period of their absence from the city, but will probably go as far North as Yosemite, or even farther. The new policy of the company is to remain on the road most of the time, with brief trips back to the Los Angeles studio. Mr. Balshofer will be in the city July 5th, and leave shortly after the 10th for New York City to assume his managerial duties at the Coney Island studio and factory of the New York Motion Picture Company. The stock company will be under the management of Mr. Frank E. Montgomery, who reports that the scenic settings of Bear Valley are ideal in all respects for the filming of Western stories. Weather conditions permitting, the company will put on three films weekly. It is said that the proposed trip will be the most expensive ever taken by a local film company.

Young Deer Goes to New York.—Mr. James Young Deer, the local Pathe general manager and director, is in New York City on business in the interest of the company. Accompanying him is his wife, Red Wing. The stock company will remain idle during their absence. Mr. Young Deer and his wife plan to be gone about two weeks, after which work is expected to be resumed at the studio.

Co-Operative Film Mfg. Co. are at present engaged in making a series of commercial reels. They have entered into a contract with the local Scandinavian Society to record in moving pictures their folk dances, sports, and other events of interest occurring at their annual picnic held at East Lake Park. Most of the film will be taken at the Indian Village nearby. The society has contracted for 2,500 feet of film, of which they will take four positives for distribution in Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and the remaining copy to be shown before other branches of the society throughout their colonies in the United States. It is said that more than a thousand local members of the Swedish, Danish and Norwegian colony will take part in the dances and sports in their national costumes, which are said to be very beautiful in the ensembles.

Real Tramp "Rescues" Actor "Tramp."—That the bonds of friendship bind tightly the members of the order of "Weary Willies," knights of the road, was amply illustrated by a recent amusing incident in Long Beach while the California Motion Picture Manufacturing Company were engaged in filming a comedy near their Long Beach studio. J. E. Johnson, one of the company's actors, had a role that called for the impersonation of a tramp. Part of the scenario scene business called for Johnson being pursued and pelted with stones by an angry mob. The scene was taken near Seventh and Alamitos Streets, within a block of the company's studio. The Salt Lake railroad tracks run down Seventh and there is usually a string of box cars on the siding. Johnson, the supposed tramp, was doing his best to outrun the shower of stones, when suddenly from one of the freight cars jumped a real tramp. There was no disguise about him. He looked the part. Rushing to Johnson's aid, he gathered up a handful of stones and returned a fusilade at the actor's pursuers, who paused in amazement at the unexpected interruption. The moving picture actors, including Johnson, waited for no explanation, but hurriedly sought safety in flight.

Co-Operative Film Manufacturing Company have entered into a contract with D. H. Warner, a local lecturer, to film 500 feet of Los Angeles Street scenes. The scenes will be photographed from the front end of a street car. Views will be taken at intervals on Broadway between 9th and 2d Streets. Down Spring Street from 2d to 7th. Up 7th to Olive Street. Sixth Street from Olive Street to the Pacific Electric Depot.

Chicago Letter.

By James S. McQuade.

London observers were considerably exercised over the fact that the crowd at King George's coronation was quite appreciably smaller than that which appeared at King Edward's funeral. As early as 4 a. m. on Coronation Day, it was suspected that this would be the case; at 5 a. m., the suspicion had become a probability, and by 9 a. m. the conclusion was beyond dispute.

The cause of this difference was gravely and widely discussed. Nobody would concede that any one stayed away through lack of interest. Many offered the explanation that the newspapers had alarmed the people by exaggerated statements about the great throng that would fill the streets. The police, though unwilling to admit that the barriers might have been dispensed with, acknowledged that fear of them kept many away. Others attributed the diminution in numbers partly to the weather, while there were yet others who pointed out that the large stands, erected since Edward's funeral, absorbed large numbers from the great thoroughfares.

"Another reason given," according to the London Times," "was that the picture palaces have altered the attitude of the general public towards pageants. 'Why should we stay in a crush all day, when we can see it at night in comfort, for three pence?'" quotes that journal. The reason just given was widely offered for absentation and, in the opinion of many, had a great deal to do with the lessening of the numbers on the line of march of the procession.

Notice that the "Times" referred to picture theaters as "picture palaces." There is a name to be proud of! What a pleasant change from our "nickel theater," with all that it conveys of tawdry cheapness and cramped air space!

The picture is great, both in power and mission, whether we realize it or not. Let us, therefore, house it with dignity and replace the hovel by the "palace."

EXHIBITIONS OF KINEMACOLOR IN CHICAGO.

The Kinemacolor Company of America, with Frank Evans as representative, gave two private exhibitions daily in a parlor of the Sherman House, this city, throughout the week of June 26th.

The principal films run off were, "Lake Garda," "From Bud to Blossom," "Zoological Gardens, London," "Review of Troops by George V and the Emperor of Germany," and the "Rebel's Daughter."

In contrasting the last named film with the review of troops, which took place after the unvailing of Queen Victoria's monument, I was impressed by the great difference in the faces of the people shown, that is, so far as outline and natural tinting were concerned. The picture showing the splendid bodies of men, marching with mathematical precision of movement and time, revealed no expression on any face. There seemed to be a haze-like curtain that hid facial expression from the observer. And this prevailed throughout the entire picture.

In the "Rebel's Daughter," on the contrary, the facts of both men and women were brought out with life-like accuracy, both of changing expression and flesh tint. I had heard that the Kinemacolor process could not produce these effects and so was pleased to see with my own eyes the refutation of the statement.

Mr. Evans explained that the London atmosphere was murky when the review of the troops was photographed, hence the haze that prevented recognition of any of the faces among the marchers. But this is a serious admission, as great pageants, once fixed, are held despite weather conditions, and the public demands clear reproduction in pictures or none at all.

It was observed throughout the exhibition that red and green were the prevailing colors. At no time was blue seen. brown and mahogany tints and also orange, were caught sight of once in a while, but red and green greatly predominated.

"From Bud to Blossom," is an inspired poem told in pictures. To see the buds of various flowers open and greedily absorb the sunshine and air—each bud in its own way, and that way marked by characteristics as strong as personality in a human being—while its rich colors are unfolded to the eye, is a farther glimpse into the workings of the infinite. Here, as before, red and green rule the field of color.

In watching the pictures my eyes at no time troubled me. Quite a number of exhibitors attended the demonstrations during the week and all were cordially received by Mr. Evans.

Percy Wark, mechanical expert of the Kinemacolor Company of America, was also present during the exhibitions. The party returned to New York Sunday, July 2nd.

Chicago Picture Shows

Boston Theater. Last Monday, about 6.30 p. m., I dropped into the Boston Theater on Madison Street, expecting to see some good independent pictures. I was sadly disappointed. There were some good independent films there all right, but they were shown in the worst possible manner. A poster outside announced the Rex film, "On the Brink," a really fine film, as "first time shown." As a matter of fact, it was five days old, and looked fifteen—rather rainy and badly cut up. I counted no less than eighteen operating room patches as the film was run. This is inexcusable. The Boston Theater probably was not responsible for all of them, but it is not unlikely that it was at fault for some of them, to judge from the rate of speed at which the films were run. This reel was run in exactly 12½ minutes by the watch.

The next reel, the American Film Manufacturing Company's "Witch of the Range," was given in 15 minutes, but the action seemed hurried all the way through it. The third reel, a Powers split reel, was put over in 12 minutes. I am sorry to note that the operator displayed the slide of the new Union Local No. 2. It is not much of a credit to the union to have its "union label" put on a show which is as much of a speed contest as this one was.

Projection itself at the Boston, aside from the fast running, is not so bad; the light is fair, and some attempt has been made to shade the slide lights, though they do cast considerable light on the screen. The lights on the ceiling are shaded with cone shades, which are not deep enough for the ordinary bulb; the substitution of the "meridian" or spherical type of lamp would correct this.

The manager, too, might be a little more honest with the public in announcing the films. A film is not "first time shown" on the day after its release, or five days after its release. A poster for the Essanay film of the Indianapolis auto races was exhibited outside, but the film shown was the old one of some races at Elgin, made by the American Motor Racing Picture Company. The patronage of the Boston is not as large as it was when it first turned Independent and used a real service of first-run films on the release dates, and gave them a more nearly normal time of running than they now get.

Casino Theater.—Across the street, the Casino Theater presents a fairly good show. First-run Licensed films are used, and are not badly projected, though the throw is so short as to necessitate the use of a lens of too short focus for really good results. This house has a real piano player, who follows the pictures very closely, and almost makes them talk. The screen is badly light-struck by the light from the rear ceiling lights, which are high candle power lamps enclosed in orange colored lanterns, of just the worst color possible to injure the photographic tones of the picture on the screen. I have noticed that the warm colors (red, orange, yellow) affect a picture on the curtain far more than do the colder colors of green or blue. Green is the only color of light which may strike the screen in any quantity without almost killing the picture, and at the same time it serves its purpose of illuminating the house well.

Orpheum Theater.—I hate to say it, but it is the truth: the other day I saw the fine Eclipse production of "The Taming of the Shrew" at this theater, and during the running of this reel, as well as of others, the operator neglected his light until the entire lower half of the curtain was a yellow haze. This happened not only once, but three or four times, and each time the picture was allowed to show yellow corners for fully a minute. Such careless operating as this ought not to be permitted at all in the Orpheum, which has many times been pointed out the best picture theater in Chicago. Conditions for projection at the Orpheum are not of the best anyway, and the lower part of the picture, for several reasons, deserves more attention than it generally gets. The foreground of nearly all pictures is in shadow, as a rule, when the picture is taken, resulting in a dense part of the film there. Also, in many theaters, the lower half, or more, of the screen is insufficiently protected from extraneous light, tending to kill the picture there if not very well lighted. So it behooves the operators to keep their lamps well trimmed and to handle their carbons carefully, if they wish to get the most out of the picture.

Album Theater.—This house, located at Madison Street and Western Avenue, is another horrible example of how not to do it. Three reels of Independent films, mostly old ones, are shown very poorly on a streaky aluminum screen. The music was very bad—of the "jackass" variety, ragtime and racket. The theater was altogether too dark, though the screen was light-shot from the lights outside. A row of posts down the middle of the house spoils all the best seats, and renders necessary a side throw, which does not improve matters any. The only real good thing on the program was the illustrated song, by a girl singer with a good voice, though even this was marred by the drummer's senseless racket.

Bell Theater.—Across the street, it was a positive relief to look at the picture at the Bell Theater. Projection very fine, picture clear, steady and free from flicker, not hurried a bit even though it was the last show. The ideal of a perfect motion picture is closely approached here. Licensed films are used, service of about 2, 10 and 30 days respectively. Business is so good at the Bell that it can afford to run matinees every day, which can be said of very few houses out of the loop. Operator Bemo Annaberg kept his light very well, and the work of the piano player was worthy of note. The Messrs. Bell certainly have a house to be proud of.

Garfield Theater.—The Garfield Theater, at Madison Street and Francisco Avenue, is another modern house devoted to photoplays. A big electric sign outside announces "Photoplays and Songs," and another sign below the canopy tells you to "Enjoy yourself. We provide the show." One can enjoy himself here, all right. The picture on the curtain is very good, the seats comfortably and roomy, and the music excellent. The house seats 740, and though it was a hot night, only a few seats were vacant, showing that the neighborhood had learned to appreciate good pictures. Service is licensed, much like that of the Bell Theater, 2, 7 and 20 days. The light was well handled by Operator Halliday, though a better and brighter picture might be secured if an aluminum curtain were used, as the throw is pretty long and the picture by no means small.

Lyceum Theater.—This is a little store show at Malison Street and Sacramento Boulevard. It is not at all inviting, as the manager has plastered it up with stock posters of various kinds, making the place look more like a circus than a theater. The picture is fair, but nothing extra. Independent films are used here.

Dreamland Theater.—This house, a few doors west of the Lyceum, is one of the prettiest little theaters in the city. It is done in pure Mission style, without any plaster or gingerbread work. The picture within it, however, is very poor. Lights are not properly shaded, and the operator can not get a very good light, even with 60 amperes of alternating current, because of improper optical conditions at the machine. The baseboard of the machine is one suitable for use with a short focus lens, while the long throw at the Dreamland makes necessary a 10-inch lens, which makes it impossible to get a good light with a short baseboard. It seems to me that machine manufacturers ought to supply baseboards of sufficient length to allow of the right distance between condensers and machine, even with long focus lenses.

Albany Theater.—Situated just west of the Dreamland, this house is projecting one of the best pictures in the city. Manager Hoehn says that he would rather give full time to all his reels, and his program shows it. The light, in the hands of J. P. Lucas, the operator, was very fine, the picture steady, and the show altogether a very pleasant one. Mr. Hoehn does not object to having the reels a little old, since he can have his choice of them, and also can have the opinions of his friends as to their quality. Licensed films are used.

Irvin G. Ries, moving picture operator of the National Theater, Akron, O., owned by L. A. Shiappacasse, was in the city last Monday. Mr. Shiappacasse commends very highly the ability of Mr. Ries. He has held his position for the last three years. The National is a 10-cent Licensed theater, running pictures exclusively. Four reels daily are used, the service being furnished by the General Films Co.'s branch at Pittsburg. The National will run all summer, as has been its custom for the past five years.

The Boston Theater (Independent) on East Madison Street, has had a high-class musical attraction for the past five weeks in the Apollo quartet, the members being talented and experienced vocalists. R. Bruce Logan, founder of the quartet, is the basso; H. Gluckstone, baritone; H. Ryan, first tenor, and C. A. Broadbridge, second tenor. The Boston is holding its own during the hot weather.

James Campbell Boyle, who operateds a Licensed picture theater in Calgary, Canada, was in the city recently.

E. T. League, owner of the Crystal Theater, Plymouth, Ind., has under consideration the taking over of a lease on the Nelson Opera House, Logansport, Ind. The Nelson has been a legitimate house playing traveling attractions. It seats 1500 people. Mr. League will run it henceforth as a straight picture theater, with the best Licensed service obtainable. A seven-piece orchestra will be used. It is the intention to keep the Nelson open throughout the summer.

Manager Sherwood, of the Fuller Opera House and the Fairplay Theater, Madison, Wis., called last week. He states that business is very good. He has raised the quality of his service during the warm weather, a policy that it would be well for other exhibitors to consider. Manager Sherwood uses a Licensed service.

Joseph G. Rhode, owner and manager of the Rhode Opera House, Kenosha, Wis., was in the city last week and arranged for advanced bookings with the General Film Co.'s branch at 117 N. Dearborn. He reports excellent business.

H. R. Bennett, of the Idle Hour Theater, Michigan City, Ind., was a caller at the General Film Company's branch, 117 N. Dearborn. He reports that his business is picking up, that the car shops are now running with full force, and that money is plentiful.

Chas. Smith, owner of the Lyric Theater, Elgin, Ill., paid a visit last week and reported excellent business for the Essanay auto race pictures. He played against the Wallace circus, but got his share of the 25,000 people that came from surrounding towns.

C. C. Hinebaugh, of South Bend, Ind., has sold the Royal in that city and secured the Indiana Theater, in the same city. The Indiana has a better location and a larger capacity than the Royal. Mr. Hinebaugh arranged with the General Film Co.'s branch at 117 N. Dearborn for service.

H. C. Engledrum, of the Majestic Theater, Paris, Ill., called at the General Film Company's office, 17-19 S. Wabash, and arranged for a daily change in service, instead of three times per week as formerly.

Manager F. C. Aiken, of the General Film Company's branch, 17-19 S. Wabash, reports a continued big demand for the auto races at Indianapolis, "Ten Nights in a Bar Room," "Faust," and "Enoch Arden."

T. L. Siebert, an old-time vaudeville man, has secured a theater at Lick Springs, Ind. He will remodel the theater, which henceforth will be known as the Orpheum. It will be opened July 1st. Mr. Siebert contracted last week with the General Film Company's branch, 435 N. Clark St., for a complete Kinodrome service.

C. E. Cole, owner and manager of the Royal Theater, Elkhart, Ind., has closed his house for remodeling. He will open again in a few weeks. Mr. Cole gets his service from the General Film Company's office at 435 N. Clark St.

Friends of "Daddy" Richardson, one of the most beloved old men in the ranks of picture players, and a most valued member of the Selig Western Company, will be grieved to learn that he has been seriously ill for the last two weeks,, and that his physicians have little hope for his recovery.

E. H. Montagu, European representative of the Selig Polyscope Company, writes me that Coronation week was remarkable for the fine decorations, brilliant illuminations and splendid pageants seen. "The streets were certainly not crowded," writes Mr. Montagu. "I walked down from home at midday and had a fine view of the king and queen in their crowns and jewels."

The Industrial Moving Picture Company recently finished a picture of the Elks' Convention at Aberdeen, S. D. The company has also completed 4,000 feet of industrial subjects, showing the timber and farming industries in Alabama.

The French-American Producing Company, of this city, has arranged to take pictures of the Sane Fourth Celebration in Chicago, devoting 2,000 feet of film to the subject.

Arrangements have recently been made for dispatching a company of actors, cameramen, workmen, tec., from the Selig Western plant, to Albuquerque, New Mexico, early in August. The productions will be in charge of Hobart Bosworth. Most of the subjects will be Indian stories, and many Indians of that section have been engaged to take part in the productions. Iseleta, in the South, Old towns in the East, and Tacus in the North, have been selected as the scenes of production.

New animal quarters are being built at the Selig plant for the large menagerie carried by the Selig Company. A large force of carpenters has been engaged in building new summer cages for the dumb players. Huge quarters of concrete, steel and wood, will house the lions, tigers, wolves, pumas, bears, etc. Running water will be a comfortable feature of these cages. The elephants, camels, etc., will all be sheltered in a big arena adjoining the cages.

Frank Cook, program manager of the Saxe enterprises, Milwaukee, has informed me that work on the Theatorium will begin about a week from date. He advised me that all records at the Orpheum were broken by the Auto Races at Indianapolis.

Boston.

The Independent houses of Boston "put it over" on their Licensed competitors as far as the coronation pictures of George V. are concerned. Independent houses were exhibiting their reels all day Saturday, July 1. Licensed houses did not receive the picture much before 9 p. m. on that day. The Licensed reels became lost for a short time in the Boston depot, owing to some minor wreck, and several other minor delays conspired to hold the Pathe reel from finding its way to the General Film Company during the day.

Biograph's "Fighting Blood" came in for much favorable comment in local houses. It is not often that Biograph attempts "action" pictures; but when they do—they usually make good.

There is one manager in Boston who is not suffering from the heat, to judge from his looks. His name is Mr. J. Lourie, of the Beacon Theater, Tremont Street. Mr. Lourie is as "brown as a nut," due to a week's fishing trip in Maine. He has put in a very busy season, going between his Boston house and his Colonial Theater, Nashua, N. H. The Colonial was closed on Saturday, July 1, and will reopen during the middle of August. Mr. Lourie states that he is well satisfied with the Colonial's business, and expects to have a big trade next season.

Manager Joe Roth revived "Nero at the Burning of Rome" for his patrons. "By special request" was the reason given by Manager Roth. The Ambrosio reel drew very well.

Mr. George Delmore has signed a contract to take charge of the picture programs for the Bowdoin Square and Howard theaters, beginning in August. Mr. Delmore remarked that he feels sure he can make happy selections for the picture programs, but that good machines are also very much needed to insure good results. Mr. Delmore intends to install the Powers Cameragraph No. 6 in the theaters.

Rumor has it that the large National Theater, which was expected to open last fall, but which is still dark, will surely open in August. The house will open with either "pop" vaudeville and pictures, or a stock company, as the attraction. The house is controlled by B. F. Keith.

The Columbia Theater, which Marcus Loew has acquired, continues to be a point of perplexity for all concerned. The latest news from the house is to the effect that Messrs. Edwards and Farren have secured a further extension of one week on the house. It is stated that if the required bond is filed the Columbia will remain a burlesque house. The formal transfer of the house to Mr. Loew and his associates has been delayed. The house was acquired by the Loew interests through a foreclosure sale, under which Mr. Loew bought the theater proper. Now it comes to the surface that Messrs. Edwards and Farren held a lease on a certain section of the Columbia which was untouched by this foreclosure sale. Court proceedings have been in order for some months now, and the final edict was to the effect that Messrs. Farren and Edwards must deposit, as a bond, $125,000, to cover any judgment for damages secured by Marcus Loew, as he stated he was about to institute a suit against the theater owners. However, the bond was not filed within the required time, and notice was given to transfer the property to Mr. Loew's interests, owing to this default. HENRY.

Clyde Martin's Tour a Big Success.

Clyde Martin, who has been "playing the pictures" while en route for the Selig Polyscope Co., for the last two months, came into the city Monday, June 26, and will remain for a few days.

Mr. Martin traveled through Indiana, Kentucky and Ohio during the trip just ended. His next will embrace Illinois, Missouri, Kansas, Colorado, Wyoming and Iowa, and will last about 60 days.

Mr. Martin has worked up a strong accompaniment for pictures, giving sound effects in addition to piano and drums. He uses two men for these effects while on the road, picking them up in various towns and instructing them during the day. One of these men he places in the orchestra pit, the other behind the curtain. Mr. Martin is constantly improving the sound effects, which met with considerable favor during his tour.

Managers have been much pleased with Mr. Martin's visit and, in many instances, they have added drummers after witnessing his accompaniment, being impressed with the value of a good drummer in a picture house. It was the custom for managers of houses, other than the one in which he appeared, to have their musical forces attend the show to judge of his "playing the pictures." On many occasions fifteen or more musicians occupied the first row one night. These musicians were always congenial, and spurred Mr. Martin to finer efforts by their goodfellowship and congratulations.

In Keith's theater, Cleveland, fourteen managers of other theaters were present the night Mr. Martin played there. The large audience contributed liberal applause after each number, and hearty commendations were paid him by the managers.

Mr. Martin speaks in terms of high praise of the picture managers he met on his travels. "They are business men of good standing in their communities and have succeeded in attracting the very best people to their houses," he emphatically states.

"The picture business has suffered considerably of late from the hot weather, but the volume before that gave prosperous results," says Mr. Martin. He praises the picture houses of Cincinnati and Louisville as being fine structures, thoroughly modern and fire-proof, and specially built for pictures exclusively.

Mr. Martin desires to thank managers for the courtesies extended him and for the liberal announcements made in advance, in newspapers and by posters, of Selig night. During the entire trip Mr. Martin says that Selig night never failed to bring a crowded house.

He'd Seen it Before

(Puck.)

In a "Touring Europe" party was a member named McCarty,
Who had never been away from home before;
And though all his prior travel had been on the country gravel,
Yet to him the whole trip seemed an awful bore.
At last one day we asked him, and in a manner gentle taxed him,
To inform us why the journey seemed so slow;
Then he gave this explanation, to our mighty consternation:
"I have seen it at the moving-picture show."

Well, we showed him every wonder, but he treated us like dunder-
Heads, he constantly felt more and more ennui;
What we thought must sure impress him only managed to distress him,
And he rested while we raved about Paree.
Up the highest Alps we took him, but emotion never shook him
As he gazed ten thousand feet to depths below;
And he said (it was heartrending, as on ropes we were descending):

Once some brigands bold entrapped us, took our coin and then kidnapped us
And at point of knives were leading us away,
When McCarty, little hero, grabbed a gun and cool as Nero,
Plugged the low-browed scoundrels a la U. S. A.
Then we wrung his hand and kissed him, but our gratitude all missed him:
"Why," said he, "that's very common, don't you know,
"In at least a dozen cities, and with phonographic ditties,

So we gave it up despairing, for the effort was too wearing,
And we figured that we'd all be old and gray
Ere we found, within earth's borders, anything those film-recorders Couldn't show him for a nickel every day.
And if e'er the pearly portal opens to this pampered mortal,
As I trust it will when he is done below,
I believe he'll tell St. Peter, the alleged official greeter:

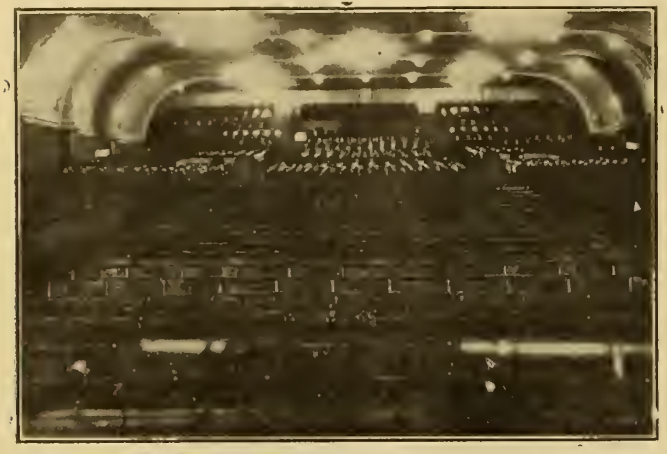
LECTURES ON FEATURE FILMS.

The Moving Picture World has repeatedly dwelt on the need of a lecture or "picture reading" in connection with feature films. If such films are properly presented and duly advertised, they have ten times the drawing power of the ordinary program. The public demands and welcomes these lectures, wherever they have been heard. They are not an experiment, but have for the last five years proven distinct successes wherever they have been put before the public. The peer and pioneer of this most valuable feature of the moving picture entertainment is Mr. W. Stephen Bush, who has traveled in nearly every part of the country, presenting his lectures on current or older films. Hundreds of testimonials of exhibitors attest the fact of his usefulness. The services of Mr. Bush may be secured through the office of this paper.

Coliseum Theater, Seattle, Wash.

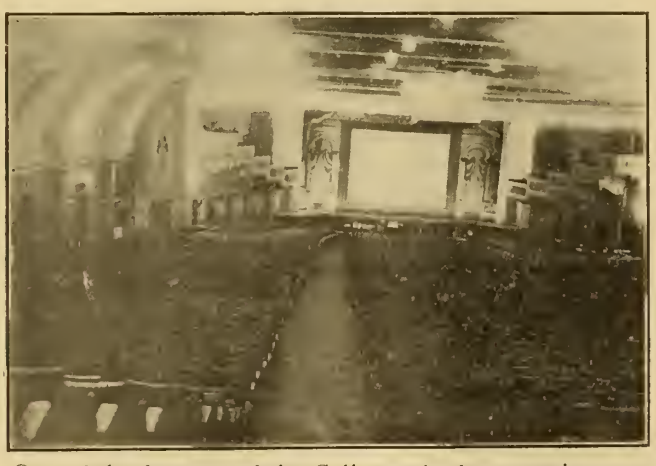
The cuts herewith show not only one of the most perfect theaters, but the largest in the United States. It is the Coliseum Theater at Seattle Wash., formerly the Orpheum Theater. The auditorium has a seating capacity of 2600, with 22 boxes and loges in reserved sections. On each side of the mezzaine floor are 11 boxes and loges, and this makes a good arrangement for box parties. The 2600 mahogany opera chairs are roomy, being 24 inches in width. The layout of the house is very simple, as the 2600 seats are on one floor with no balconies, thus doing away with crowded houses.

On entering the theater, which has a frontage of 30 feet, there is a large open lobby about 60 feet long, which is well equipped with mirrors, which the women patrons appreciate. Artistic posters are placed about the lobby, care, however, being taken in selecting posters.



From the lobby we enter the foyer, which is 90 by 40 feet. In the foyer there are smoking and retiring rooms, one for the ladies and one for the gentlemen, which are in easy reach of all. From the foyer there are three entrances leading to the mezzaine floor, three six-foot aisles permit the handling of patrons without unnecessary crowding. The aisles and foyer are carpeted in green with velvet to match. The ceiling and side-wall decorations are very pleasing. Two large chandeliers adorn the ceiling. The exits are very favorable points about the Coliseum, there being nine wide exits leading from the mezzaine floor to the street, other exits being from the stage and foyer.

The house is closed between five and seven o'clock, and is then thoroughly cleaned and ventilated, thus having no use for electric fans, even in hot weather.



One of the features of the Coliseum is the operating room, which is hung from the ceiling directly in center with the picture curtain, which is a 70-foot throw. The operator's room is an iron frame, metal-lined, passing all requirements of the underwriters. It is furnished with two Powers No. 6 cameragraphs, one dissolving stereopticon, and one spot light, with an extra emergency lamp. The lighting of the house is very good; a newspaper can easily be read at any time during the show.

The policy of the theater is first-run Independent pictures, with two of the best vocalists to be had. They are Mae Thurston, the famous soprano, and Percy Bretland, the popular baritone.

The five-piece orchestra is under the direction of Prof. Chas. Higgins. The orchestra plays to the pictures in a very pleasing manner, Prof. Higgins being very careful in his choice of music to accompany the pictures.

Mr. S. A. Powell, formerly in the East, is acting in the capacity of manager. Mr. Powell's experience in the show business dates back twelve years. Mr. H. L. Betten, of similar experience, is the treasurer. Mr. Powell stated that he proposes to give Seattle the best shows that have ever been given here.

A neat, clean house with uniformed ushers, an excellent show and good management make things look as though the Coliseum is to be a success from the start.

The Universal Applause Supply Company.

Become a Subscriber and Dispense with Quality Films.

Being an old moving picture man, I was startled the other day by reading in display type this advertisement, which is here repeated:

No more Failures! No more Failures!!
Success guaranteed to theaters, photoplay halls, exhibitors.
We will boost your business.
Address the U. A. S. Co. (Unlimited.)
Street.

I lost no time in finding the place, which consisted of a suite of spacious offices in charge of a strong clerical force. I explained to the courteous clerk in the reception hall that I desired to see the head manager of the concern.

"Mr. Boreas T. Wyndblough is the gentleman you wish to see," replied the clerk, and directed me into the antechamber of the rear office. I waited there some few minutes and was then ushered into the presence of Mr. Wyndblough.

"You want an idea of our work here?" queried Mr. W. with an engaging smile. "Pleased to give it to you, sir. You see we are the Universal Applause Supply Company, organized and chartered under the laws of Delaware, New Mexico and New Jersey, with a paid-in capital of $1,000,000. Our operations are national in scope and our motto is spot cash for spot service. If an exhibitor or other showman fails, it is his own fault entirely. We supply applause at rates within the reach of all. We distinguish four grades of work, ordinary, plain applause $20 a month in advance, a stronger grade where the pictures are older and the illustrated singer is an amateur and a third grade, a trifle higher in price, where we have to down opposition."

"What is your fourth grade?" I asked, much edified by this recital.

"That, sir, is the star service. Where moving pictures and vaudeville are exhibited together at 5 cents admission, it is no easy matter to work up applause. It requires some courage and proper physique to back it up to deliberately applaud at the end of the acts. Nevertheless, we pride ourselves on the excellence of this branch of our service. Let me show you the photos of our Grade C corps."

Mr. Wyndblough showed me a choice collection of strong looking gentlemen, who had evidently paid no heed, when at the time of being taken they had been admonished to look pleasant.

"We take only picked men for this work," continued Mr. B. T. W., growing enthusiastic. "Only men having experience in practical primary work and general electioneering and graduates of the B. B. A. are eligible."

"What is the B. B. A.?" I asked.

"The Bowery Bouncers Academy," replied Wyndblough. "We make an extra charge when one of our men is wounded in a riot or when the 5-cent artists have to be carried home; I mean escorted to their hotels, for it may happen that the police or sheriff stand in with the mob."

"We have a special service, which we furnish on request. Tin horns and stamping of feet for Western shows, leading the audience in whistling, laughing uproariously at any film labeled comic, sobbing, and audible tears for melodramas are some of the items in this feature service. It stimulates the feelings of the audience and gives the place, where we send our skilled corps of promoters and accelerators, a familiar and home-like air. If the crowd is slow in catching up the chorus of the illustrated song, our select staff of vocal prompters will be found useful. They are all strong and of highly tested lung capacity."

Mr. Wyndblough insisted on my taking a cigar, and concluded:

"You see, therefore, that all this talk about the quality of the picture is quite beside the mark. Let the manufacturer produce some kind of a film, let there be a machine, through which this film may be threaded and run and we do the rest. The public will never and need never know."

The Strike That Failed.

A Short Story from Moving Picture Life.

Wixey, the operator, and "Pomp Owens," the piano player and singer of illustrated songs, were sitting in the "knockery" of the Elite Photoplay Theater at the most unusual hour of 9 A. M. They were in the airing of their grievances nobly supported by the third member of the Elite's working staff, a strange youth of uncertain complexion and known by the odd sobriquet of "Snakes." "Snakes" was prematurely bald, very obliging and ambitious and positively unequaled as a worker of effects. If things were getting dull and dreary on the screen and a death scene or farewell struggle lasted too long "Snakes," with a few tremendous, if well chosen thumps behind the scenes, would rouse the audience to new interest. It was said that "Snakes" was a high graduate from a snake charming college somewhere in the South and that he had handled all varieties of venomous reptiles, that he had been bitten often, but was immune and that he had left the circus business, because the daughter of a wealthy farmer whom he had met at a county fair, had jilted him, after giving him great hope.

Wixey ran his skilled fingers along the sprocket holes of a suspicious film, with all surgical instruments close at hand. "Pomp" was looking over some music. It was very warm and "Snakes" asked whether he should get some lemons for making a cooling drink, he was such a loyal, helpful soul. Wixey sent him forth and as he came back began to rehearse the speech he intended addressing to the proprietor that very morning. The "knockery" was a favorite place for rehearsing the speeches that were to be addressed to the owner or for giving belated vent to those speeches that should have been or would have been addressed to him in the office, but never were.

"Well," said Wixey, "I guess there'll be another operator here a week from tomorrow. Did you see a ghost in the picture last night? Muller came into the booth twice to kick last night and I cannot stand it any more. Honest, was there anything wrong?"

"Why no," answered "Pomp" absently, for he took no interest in any grievance but his own. "I am thumping the keys the best I know how and the other day Muller swore because I played a lot of German airs while they showed how Limburger was made. Said it made his German patrons sore."

"Yes," put in "Snakes" timidly, "a fellow gets no credit nowadays for trying to be the real cheese."

"You remember," continued Wixey, "when we had 'The Old Homestead' booked for Thanksgiving and they sent us 'The Sponge Fishers of Cuba.' Why I went right into the city and got the reel out of the express office; it was on its way to Podunk, though we had paid a premium for it. What thanks do I get?"

"None," replied "Pomp," sententiously. "And I don't like his remarks about the way I fix my hair. Say, Wixey, would you stay for three more bucks?"

"Really," remarked Wixey, "I care more for kind treatment. I am going to tell him (Mr. Muller) you forget an operator has feelings and when the picture gets out of focus a moment, it does not help me to have you grind your teeth and glare at me and say things."

"I think I'll go on the Heath and Doctor Circuit anyway," volunteered "Pomp," who often suffered from visionary hopes of large salaries. "These 'boobs' here would not give you a hand, if you played your fingers off."

"Why don't you strike, boys," chimed in "Snakes," with many crafty winks. "I am with you and I vouch for Rosie, the ticket taker."

It was well known that Rosie regarded "Snakes" as one of the world's humble, and but for her, unappreciated heroes.

"I think," resumed Wixey, "we had better arbitrate. Better treatment, no calling of names and a raise. If we do not get what we want we go out this evening." He paused for a reply.

"Suits me," asserted "Pomp." "I will talk to him if you want me to."

This was agreed to at once and an acute stage in the Elite's phase of the struggle between capital and labor seemed to have arrived. "Pomp" gave a particularly defiant attitude to his hand-made coiffure and the hopes of all rose high, when the side door opened and Mr. Muller walked in.

He was pleased to see the boys at work so early, and told them so.

"That's the spirit," continued Mr. Muller, who was really doing a fine business at the Elite. "I appreciate it, boys! You need a little shaking up once in a while, but you are not a bad lot by any means. I had just about decided to raise you all around and I think I'll do it now. Come with me, boys, across the way to Gaalbing's. We'll have a bite and a drop to celebrate. Will you come?"

They came.

Outline of How to Write a Photoplay.

By Everett McNeil.

1. Synopsis.—Write a synopsis of the story of the play. Make the synopsis as brief as possible, and yet have it tell the real story of the play.

2. Cast of Characters.—Follow the synopsis with a cast of all the important characters. Describe each important character briefly, not forgetting that the producers know enough to know the obvious without being told.

3. The Scenario Proper.—Follow the cast of characters with the scenario proper. Divide the scenario into scenes, giving each change in the location of the action a separate scene—that is, whenever the plot renders it necessary for the operator to change the position of his camera, as from an interior to an exterior view, begin a new scene. Number the scenes consecutively to the end of the play. At the beginning of each scene, give a brief but clear word picture of the settings of the scene; also the position and action of the characters introduced when the picture first flashes on the screen. Do not over-burden these descriptions with words, and yet tell all that it is necessary for the proper picturing of the scene, again remembering that the producers are wise in these things. Now carefully study out the needed action for each scene; and then describe it briefly, being careful to cut out every act that does not have a direct bearing on the development of the plot. Do not enter too much into details in these descriptions. One again the producers are wise in these things, and need only pointers. They can supply all the details, when the details are obvious from the context.

Use sub-titles or leaders sparingly—only when necessary to the proper understanding of the play. Make the action in the pictures tell the story as nearly as possible. Never use a note or a letter, unless the action absolutely demands it.

Introduce your important characters in the first scene, when possible, and begin the scene with a situation that will at once arouse interest in what is to follow. Then be sure that you satisfy this interest by a logical development of the plot and the interest to the climax. Then stop. No anti-climaxes needed. Have only two or three leading characters, and confine the plot to them. No side complications are needed.

Do not introduce bar-room scenes, drunkenness, needless drinking, brutal murders, robberies, etc. Keep your plays clean. Get as much uplift in them as you can. A good moving picture play can be made as powerful, nay, more powerful, for good than a good sermon.

In conclusion, a few words regarding the preparation of the manuscript may not be amiss:

Write on one side of the paper.

Do not roll, fold the manuscript.

Use a typewriter, if possible. Editors of scenarios are busy people and cannot take time to study out illegible handwriting.

Use two long sizes of envelopes, one to send the manuscript in, the other for the use of the editor, if he returns the manuscript. Stick the proper amount of stamps on the return envelope. The return envelope should be a size smaller than the envelope in which the manuscript is sent, so that it can be enclosed with the manuscript without folding. Also put your name and address on the return envelope.

Do not write in a week to ask what has been done with your manuscript. Wait a month, even six weeks before writing.

Always keep a copy of every manuscript sent out, also an account of when and where sent and returned.

In every way in the preparation of the manuscript, try to help the editor to come to a prompt and a just decision, by having the manuscript correctly and clearly written, so that neither eye nor the brain will have to study over it in order to understand its meaning.

CHAS. K. FRENCH,

Assistant Director and Leading Man of the Western Pathe Stock Company.

Progress of the Independent Product.

Once in a while we hear particular praise of some of the moving picture productions of several years ago and comparisons not always favorable to present day effort. We are inclined to believe that this is hardly fair and just criticism, and think that the critic who has an idea that better work was done in former years overlooks a very important factor in arriving at such a conclusion. Years ago the moving picture was a novelty and was not compelled to stand the searching criticisms and comparisons of today. The public had no standard to go by in the early days in regard to photographic quality, stagecraft, proper presentation of plot, or the hundred and one fine points now so well known. All producers and film manufacturers are well aware that many an oversight in small details, that would pass absolutely unnoticed a few years ago, will often prove sufficient now to spell complete failure. There can be no question but that the quality in every respect of the photoplay has advanced in a marked degree in the past year or two and we are not now speaking of the work of any one manufacturer, but of the product of every manufacturer in the field. A much higher standard is imperative now than ever before and undoubtedly a still better standard will have to be reached by every film manufacturer who would maintain his hold on public favor and a foremost place in the picture play market. This will be still more the case when the open market becomes an assured fact.

That the product of certain manufacturers is meeting with its share of public approbation, the following symposium of recent commendatory letters should convince the most skeptical. We have seen and read a great many others, but cannot afford space at the present time to print more.

THE AMERICAN FILM MANUFACTURING CO., May 1, 1911.
Chicago, Ill.
Gentlemen—We get two Flying A every week and our patrons look for them in advance. Our people are going wild over your Westeru releases, the applause drowning the orchestra.
W. E. Sands, Mgr., Temple Theater, Hagerstown, Md.

AMERICAN FILM MFG. CO., May 4, 1911.
Ashland Block, Chicago, Ill.
Gentlemen—Your late Western releases certainly are the goods out here. We ran "Bud Nevins, Bad Man" all day to crowded houses and have only to show American Posters now to insure great business. Am booking two American Cowboy films every week and will continue to do so.
Yours restpectfully,
Albin Czech, Prop., Wonderland Theater, 1335 Milwaukee Ave., Chicago, Ill.

CHAMPION FILM CO., March 31, 1911.
New York City.
Gentlemen—We ran "Old Man and Jim" last night and to say that it is by far the best thing in the film line in many moons is putting it weak, and I have seen some mighty good ones. We have had all the biggest features, both independent and licensed, but the "Old Man and Jim" has them all beat. If this is a sample of future "Champs" then let me say we will make it hot for our exchange if they do not furnish all "Champs" promptly.
Sincerely,
Chas. H. Lynch, of Rothenberg & Lynch, Spring Valley Ill.

GREAT NORTHERN FILM CO.,
New York City.
Gentlemen—Can you send me some more portraits of scenes of the plays in your film? I always get one of your films each week and I am sorry I can't get more. They go good here.
Sincerely yours,
A. D. Resnick, Mgr., The New Casino Theater, 2853 Cross St., Philadelphia.

New York City. Jan. 25, 1911.
Gentlemen—We are using Independent service and have enjoyed many of your beautiful films. Have your pictures for display in our lobby on Eclair Day, as we have been featuring them? The people down here were wedded to Association reels, but we have convinced them the Independents can't be beat.
The Gem Theater, 288 Oak St., Palestine, Tex.

ECLAIR FILM CO., October 25, 1910.
New York City.
Gentlemen—To me your releases are the acme of perfection in photography and it is a real joy to show them. I use ninety day old films and if I could would make a feature of all your releases—would have Eclair days.
Yours truly,
Geo. H. Cox, The Elite Theater and Airdome, Hays, Kansas.

THE INDEPENDENT MOVING PICTURES CO., March 5, 1911.
New York City.
Gentlemen—I use all Imp Releases and repeat on some of them. I would just as soon go out of business as be without an Imp picture.
L. Miller, Royal Theater, Delphos, O.

MR. R. PRIEUR, April 4, 1911.
10 East 15th St., New York City.
Gentlemen—Please send me a list of your releases for the coming four weeks, as I want to feature Lux films. Like them best of all the releases I get.
W. J. DeLamater, Crown Theater, San Antonio, Tex.

GREAT NORTHERN FILM CO., April 3, 1911.
New York City.
Gentlemen—I wish to congratulate you and the company you represent on the films you are turning out. I do think the work is wonderful both in photography, acting, and rock-bed steadiness on the screen. I am managing a big house here in Philadelphia and the comments of the audience is most gratifying.
Yours truly,
G. B. Graff, 23 N. Ninth St., Philadelphia, Pa.

IND. MOVING PICTURES CO., April 8, 1911.
New York City.
Gentlemen—We would like if possible to get the pictures of the Imp players for use in the lobby of our theater. Our patrons like the Imp pictures especially. Your Cuban pictures are certainly fine and are greatly appreciated by the theatergoers here.
Yours truly,
A. H. Buckley, The Royal, Longmont, Colo.

CHAMPION FILM CO., April 1, 1911.
New York.
Gentlemen—I have shown your film "The Old Man and Jim" and cannot speak too highly of it. For a military and educational picture it could not be excelled. I think I would be safe in saying that nine-tenths of the school children of this town saw the picture. I am now looking forward to the time when I can run one of your historicals per week.
Very truly,
W.A.Coulter, Family Theatorium, Grove City, Pa.

MR. R. PRIEUR,
New York City.
Dear Sir—I am running either first or second run Lux films at both of my houses—the Crescent and the Picto—and am anxious to get all the advance information I can, so please place my name on your mailing list. I find your double comedy subjects, or rather reels, big winners.
Yours truly,
Wm. F. Neil, The Picto Amusement Co., Chattanooga, Tenn.

NESTOR FILM MFG. CO., March 28, 1911.
New York City.
Gentlemen—We are great advocates of "Nestoritis" and enjoy the pleasure of advertising them. Your picture "In Commissioned Ranks" is a gem. We invited the newspaper critics to see this picture and it was announced to be the best that they had ever witnessed.
Yours respectfully,
C. Whitthorne, Star Theater, Vallejo, Cal.

NESTOR FILMS CO.,
New York.
Dear Sir—Just a word of praise in regard to your reel "In the Commissioned Ranks." It was all you said it was, only twice better. Keep it up. Nestor for mine.
Yours truly,
Nathan Offer, Mgr. Independent Amusemeut Co., Rock Springs, Wyo.

POWERS CO., May, 1911.
New York, N. Y.
Gentlemen—Our houses with about ten others in this section have jumped to the Independent side the past month, and so far all are very well pleased. We have run a number of your pictures, having "Cupid's Monkey-wrench" and "Touring Atheus" last night. Your pictures are good.
Very respectfully,
The Spragg Amusement Co., Ben L. Morris, Sec., Bellaire, O.

THE POWERS CO., May 7, 1911.
New York City, N. Y.
Gentlemen—My several houses have always looked forward with extreme pleasure to a Powers release and I have watched the rapid strides you have made in excellence of your photography. Powers pictures of today are unusually good.
Sincerely yours,
F. F. Peters, The Peters Circuit, Corning, N. Y.

REX CO., March 29, 1911.
New York City.
Gentlemen—Just a word of thanks for your fine film. My theater has contracted for your film, first run, all releases. We wish to congratulate you on artistic taste and knowledge of stagecraft.
The Class "A" Theater, H. J. Brown, Mgr., Seattle, Wash.

THANHOUSER CO., April 2, 1911.
New Rochelle, N. Y.
Gentlemen—We are using two Thanhousers a week and would use more if we could get them. We never miss a chance to advertise and feature them, especially the "Thauhouser Kid," who is a great favorite with our patrons.
Yours respectfully,
Harry D. Mapes, Adv. Mgr., Fairyland Theater, Waterloo, Iowa.

THANHOUSER CO.,
New Rochelle, N. Y.
Gentlemen—We are now getting two Thanhousers instead of one each week. We ran "Robert Emmet" the other day and must say they don't come any better.
Sydney Jacobson, Mgr., Crystal Theater.
612 Seventh St., N. W., Washington, D. C.

YANKEE FILM CO., Dec. 22, 1910.
New York City.
Gentlemen—About a month ago we changed to Independent service. It was the best move we ever made. The Yankee film "A Ward of Uncle Sam" was one of the greatest pictures ever shown on a screen. Have instructed the Exchange that we must have all of the Yankee releases. The Yankee films are certainly great drawing cards for any theater.
Yours truly,
John F. Meth, Mgr., Grand Theater, Springfield, Ill.

THE KALEM STOCK COMPANY IN IRELAND.

A Kalem Girl in Ireland.

Miss Agnes Mapes, writing to her brother in New York, says:

Beaufort Hotel, Beaufort, County Kerry, Ireland.

Here we are established at Killarney Lakes, though this particular spot is called Beaufort. Such a beautiful spot!—right out in the country, the mountains within a stone's throw, nearly, and we can walk to Dunloe Gap in about twenty minutes. From Cork, Monday morning we took the 10:30 a. m. train to Killarney and stopped at the Globe Hotel. It is one of the most picturesque old hotels, looking like an old English home, with garden, entering through a massive gateway, the grounds surrounded by a high stone, moss-grown wall. The hotel is right in the town, and the town is far more picturesque than Cork, though nothing like so large. I will describe the town, with its alleys of stone (white-washed, straw-roofed) cottages or cabins, and its funny little stores when I see you.

Tuseday most of us took the great trip to Killarney Lake, the Gap of Dunloe. We left the hotel in jaunting cars to the mountain pass about seven miles. These ponies, or small horses, were awaiting us at Kate Kearney's cottage (the Colleen who was famed for her beauty in song and poems) where we had a drink of goat's milk and potheen (mountain whiskey). Then we mounted our horses and rode six Irish miles—an Irish mile, according to our guide, is "a mile and a bit, and each bit is nearly a mile." If that isn't a real Irish answer!—and Oh, such a ride! The most glorious ride—mountains on either side covered with green moss, ferns and heather—rivers, bridges, farms and the lake in the Gap below us. And Oh, the most beautiful day! The sky above perfect, and just cool enough—in fact, the weather perfect. Everything was of interest, and I had such a communicative guide. On this side was purple mountain (and it was well named for its coloring; on that, Bull Mountain, for it was so bold; then Echo Lake, a man stopping the tourists to blow his bugle for us to hear the wonderful echo beyond. A few steps further a cannon was shot off for its echo (all expecting a tip); then Serpents Lake, where St. Patrick buried the last snake and promised to let it out the day after tomorrow, and tomorrow never comes. The Wishing Bridge that St. Patrick blessed, the cottage he stayed in his last three nights. Colleen Bawn's cottage, the first schoolhouse where English was taught in Killarney.

All this was just on the way through the most beautiful scenery. Then we came to the banks of the first lake, where two boatmen met us and we had our cushions on the grass just like a picnic. Then we got in our boat with four oarsmen and were rowed fourteen miles. First the Upper Lake to where the waters meet at Wier Bridge, and as they have had such dry weather the water was too shallow to allow us to take the cascade, so we got out and through the most wonderfully beautiful woods on through the other side of the rocks and bridge, and there took the boat again.

Then the second lake, passing Collen Bawn Rock, where she really lost her life, and many other little islands, the lakes all surrounded by these beautiful mountains. Then we passed through to the Lower Lakes, larger than the rest and very rough that day. We landed at Ross Castle, an old ruin once owned and lived in by the chief of old Ireland under the king who lived in Blarney Castle "where we kissed the Blarney Stone." There we were met by our jarveys with our jaunting cars and returned to the hotel about six p. m., having left at ten a. m. I never remember a more beautiful day of pleasure as far as sight-seeing goes. And the beauty of it is is that it all still holds its old look, all so quiet and peaceful without a sign of the new world marring the picture. A motor boat has never been allowed on the lakes. We came out here Wednesday. Sid found it too far from Killarney proper to run in and out for our locations, so here we are installed in a really and truly country house, by courtesy called a hotel, but in truth an old-fashioned house, and an Irish one at that. We are the only ones here, and have taken full possession, and what we haven't to make us comfortable the boys are making. We have moved and fixed differently every bit of furniture in the rooms for our own needs and satisfaction, so we are very comfortable and already have the room and home also filled with flowers, which grow everywhere. I do wish you could see the other part of our hotel as it is—in fact, the old part—right across the road, where the family lives; and the living room and saloon combined. I wish I could draw a picture of it. A long, low stone, whitewashed and strawroofed cabin or cottage in the center, a dicided door, stone paved floor, big open fireplace, peat burning, iron kettles hanging on the crane, cooking the dinner or boiling water, the Irish terrier Barney in the corner of fireplace, a big bench side of wall, hams and bacon hanging overhead and the bar on the side, the daughters acting as barmaids. In the evenings the lads and lassies come in to dance, and Miss O'Quillivan, the proprietor's daughter, plays the accordion for them to dance. Mind you, the room is a small one, and when the square dance is on we all hug the wall.

It was very cold last night, and we had our peat fire in the old fireplace in our own little parlor with its cracked leg piano, and Jack Clark played his violin and we all sang until bedtime. We scarcely need a lamp or candles to go to bed with, and, will you believe me, it is daylight until 9:30 p. m. The sun shines on a clear day until after 8 p. m., and daylight before 3 a. m. It is more like Sweden, they say. You see, we are so far north. The boys have worked like beavers since we have been here. In fact we all have. Putting up costumes, getting things in order. The stage in the field was built this morning. The boys are now building an outside bathroom. We are certainly making the Irish open their eyes. We have done in two days what they would have taken months to do. We haven't started to take pictures yet. Am glad we are out in the country for its quietude and beauty.

Miss Mapes was specially engaged by the Kalem Company for certain important rôles in their coming Irish productions. She is a young lady of exceptional ability, and is destined to play a leading part in motion picture productions.

Music for the Picture

By CLARENCE E. SINN.

"Ohio" says: "I am drummer in a picture show here. Have been devoting my attention largely to sound effects. In fact, I was engaged for that kind of work principally. The public seems to like it; the manager of the house wants it and believes it helps his business. I try to use common sense in my work, but I doubt if all the critics do the same. I read an article in the M. P. World a short time ago, wherein somebody said, 'If it is to be silent drama, for heavens' sake let it be silent (referring to the accompanying noises of music and sound effects).' Now, it has been tried a number of times to give pictures without these accompanying noises and apparently without much success. I agree with the critic in finding fault with those who have only cheap 'toys' in their outfits, and who introduce imitations in absurd places. Why should a 'dog-bark' be given simply because a dog appears in the picture? I heard a drummer some time ago use the horse-hoof effect for a horse crossing a stream and climbing up a soft, sandy bank. Such things are ridiculous. There is no use in telling the perpetrators of such rot to use judgment, for they have none. But that does not signify that all drummers are half-witted, nor do I believe that it calls for the elimination of sound effects altogether. The greater part of the public seem to like the pictures better when properly 'worked up,' and as they are the people who pay the bills their opinions must carry more weight than that of a person whose sole idea for improving the 'noises' is to cut them out."

Mr. Hall, you've evidently started something. May the seed fall in fertile places.

From Iowa: "Someone wrote you regarding photo-plays 'so carelessly thrown together as to make a musical setting very difficult, if not impossible.' I have found the same difficulty, though I suspect the fault is principally mine in most cases. I often find a really good picture whose scenes alternate so rapidly as to make it almost impossible to play more than a few bars of music to each one—not enough at any time to develop any recognizable descriptive music. I am often at a loss to know just what is the correct thing to do at such times."

When the scenes alternate so rapidly as to make it impossible to develop any recognizable descriptive music, about the next best thing to do is to play to the most prominent scenes—or rather, to select the dominant theme and fit your music to that. If this is not practical, play something neutral in character, but be careful that it does not conflict strongly with any of the scenes. Selig's "The Mission Worker" is a good picture, which might come under this heading. The scenes alternate between Chinese scenes, a sick-room, and a parlor—many of them rather short. It opens in a mission school. A mission hymn would be proper for this, in my opinion, even though the class is composed of Chinese. It is the spirit of the scene you want to catch. You can find room for plenty of "chink" music later on if you wish to play it. The sick room scenes, of course, call for a plaintive whenever long enough to "develop." I heard one pianist play "chink" plaintives and nautrals for this picture, which was correct, but in some places she had to jump from one to the other so quickly we could hardly tell what she was trying to play. Another gave it up apparently and played waltzes straight through, which did not add anything to the picture. So far as I was concerned it detracted. Another played a little intermezzo (Bratton's "In a Lotus Field") which seemed to answer the purpose very well and saved much worry. It was neither Chinese music nor pathetic, nor yet was it particularly adapted to the general run of drawing-room scenes, but it did not really conflict with any of these, and under the circumstances I thought it was a very good way out of the difficulty. Of course, the longer scenes were properly accompanied.

I visited Sitner's Theater in this city a few evenings since, and wish to compliment the pianist on his rendition of the Great Northern release, "The Ghost of the Vaults." The picture is of the "court dress" variety (knee-breeches, powdered wigs, etc.), and this precludes music of modern kind or suggestion. The opening is neutral, though rather dignified, and the music introducing the picture was in keeping. First, about sixteen measures from the "Pilgrim's Chorus" (Thanhauser), modulating as the scene partook of a sentimental character to "Song of the Evening Star" (same opera). This ran through the scenes. The garden scene with the lovers' tryst was introduced by a valse brilliante with much scale work (one of Chopin's if I am not mistaken). When the villain appears in the background the music was subdued, first by dropping the right hand and continuing the waltz mezzo forte an octave lower, then changing gradually to a heavy semi-mysterious till finish. The business with the rope ladder and the capture of the lover were described in the ordinary way with sentimental and agitato music. The dungeon scene had just enough of the prison scene from "Il Trovatore" to suggest its nature. The scene in the vault with the sepulchers was accompanied almost in toto by Beethoven's Funeral March ("On the Death of a Hero") and this was handled beautifully. First it was given as a funeral march fitting the ghostly character of the scene; then a mysterious character was given to the number, running through the sleep-walking scene and changing at the last to a decided agitato effect (this last occurring principally in the second strain of the march—the three sharps strain). The finish of this scene was a melodramatic "hurry." The manner of adapting the funeral march to several different phases of dramatic situation exemplifies what I have often contended, viz: that the manner in which your music is played is quite as important as the kind of music you play.

A suggestion for music to Vitagrap's "Tested by the Flag."—1, Soft waltz at opening, till change of scene; 2, "Mister Volunteer," (softly) till ball room scene; 3, waltz (when scene changes continue waltz softly all through next scene; 4, Trumpet calls and drums (or short march) till change; 5, heavy noisy Hurry all through battle; 6, "In an earth cell," semi-mysterious or agitato till change; 7, waltz or sentimental; 8, same as No. 6 till fighting; 9, Hurry for battle; 10, (parlor scene) waltz or sentimental; 11, military march (two scenes); 12 (same as 10), when Tow seizes Jack change to 13, short Hurry till Jack goes up stage. Then, 14, "Mr. Volunteer" softly till finish (or any neutral music. Can "play to the flag" is desired. It is optional).

John F. Meth, the popular manager of the Grand Theater, of Springfield, Ill., has resigned his position with the Kunz Bros. Amusement Co. and will in the future manage one of O. T. Crawford's chain of theaters in St. Louis, Mo.

Following the policy of the other Licensed manufacturers of increasing their weekly number of releases, the Lubin Company will, beginning July 1st, augment their output from two to three reels weekly. Their release days will be Monday, Thursday and Saturday.

Projection Department

Edited by F. H. RICHARDSON

A Word With Our Readers. With this issue the Moving Picture World enters its ninth volume, larger and better than ever. A word to the department readers may, perhaps, not be out of order at this time. The Trouble Department first saw the light of day under the title "Operator's Column." It occupied a scant column and a quarter of space. Such, however, was the need for such a work that it rapidly grew in size until for the past few months there usually has not been sufficient space available to include all matter sent in. That the department has done much to raise the standard of projection is generally conceded. That it has opened up an invaluable medium for exchange of ideas between operators and managers situated hundreds and even thousands of miles apart, is indisputable. To those who have staunchly stood by the editor, believing steadfastly in his honesty of purpose, he returns heartfelt thanks. And now, gentlemen and brothers, let us all pull together for a better department and for better projection for the future.

F. H. RICHARDSON.

Questions on Last Week's Lesson.

1. What do you understand by "Refraction of Light"?
2. What is the angle of incidence?
3. What is the angle of refraction?
4. When is the angle of incidence greater than the angle of refraction?
5. When is the angle of refraction greater than the angle of incidence?
6. What is the "Index of Refraction," and how is it found?
7. Explain why a ray of light is refracted in passing from one medium to another.
8. Explain why we do not see heavenly bodies, except those directly overhead, in their true position.
9. Explain why those planets nearest horizon are further away from their apparent position than those nearer overhear.

LIGHT LESSONS (Continued).

One point it is well to have knowledge of is the fact that, under certain conditions, a perfectly transparent medium becomes also a perfect reflector. That is to say, it reflects all the light, allowing none to pass through. This occurs when what is known as the critical angle has been passed.

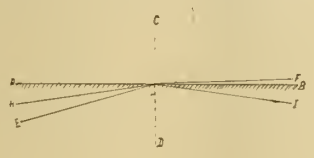

FIG. 26.

In Fig. 26 we see an illustration of the critical angle, which is defined as follows: If a ray is traversing any medium in such direction that the emergent ray just grazes the surface of the medium, the angle it makes with the normal is called the critical angle. In Fig. 26 we see a medium of glass A B, a normal C D, a ray E F, and the point of emergence G. It will be observed that, after refraction, the ray G F barely clears the surface of the glass. Now if ray E G came from H, the emergent ray would have passed the critical angle and the whole ray would be reflected back into the medium at G I. Nothing further need be said on this point, I think, since the proposition appears plain and the rule always holds good.

And now let me go back, for a moment, to reflection and set forth a point which was overlooked; a point of much importance to the operator, by the way. When a ray passes from one medium to another, as from air to glass, at an angle, the whole ray does not enter the second medium.

In Fig. 27 ray A B passes from air to glass X X at B. Presumably the whole ray will be refracted to D. This, however, is not the fact, since a portion will be reflected as ray B C. This, also, always holds good, the amount of light reflected being dependent upon (a) the angle in incidence and (b) character of surface and medium. The greater the angle at which the light strikes the surface of the second medium the larger proportion of light lost by reflection. This matter should be studied carefully by the operator since it applies particularly to the arc and condensers.

Going back, for a moment, to the critical angle, it brings us to an understanding of the fact that to the fish, or any creature under water, the field of vision into air is restricted to a cone, the width, or diameter of which is dependent on distance from the surface. Beyond this cone the fish sees, not objects in the air, but objects in the water; they being reflected back from the under surface of the water.

I only touch briefly on these things, expecting the student to study them over and grasp the main idea from what is said, reasoning out details for himself, it being understood that these lessons are not intended as a complete course in light, but, as I have said, merely complete enough to allow of a comprehensive knowledge of its general action.

The critical angle has been made use of in experimental projection, but so far has not proven of practical value. It has possibilities, however, through the use of crown glass prisms. The critical angle of crown glass is 41° 45′. If a 45° crown glass prism be placed with one of its flat faces squarely facing the light, the long side at 45° thereto, the light rays will pass into it and be totally reflected through the other flat side. By "flat faces" I mean the two sides at right angles to each other.

And now we will proceed to consider a matter of more intimate interest to the operator, viz.: lenses.

This is a subject of exceeding difficulty and, while I cannot hope that my work will be either complete or perfect, I trust we shall at the least learn something of real value.

In the first place let us briefly consider the manufacture of lenses, so far as knowledge is obtainable. Many there are who believe there is enormous profit in the making and selling of high class lenses and that there is no commensurate gain through their use. This latter possibly holds good to a considerable extent in projection, the very high grade article showing a greater degree of efficiency in photography, in which work minute exactness is imperative, if credible work is expected. Lenses must necessarily possess certain properties, viz.: refractive power, dispersive power in relation to colors, stability under excessive heat in projection work, clear, brilliant color and lack of physical defects. The first two are absolute properties necessary to results. The third is of much importance, particularly in condenser lenses, and the last two effect results very greatly.

Refractive power varies widely in different lenses. It is varied not only by the shape of the lens, but by its material constituents. Phosphorus, lead and nickel, as well as other metals, are used in the manufacture of glass and enter into its construction. The optical qualities of the glass will depend considerably upon the proportions of the various materials used in its manufacture. The measure of its power to bend a light ray is called its refractive index. What we call white light is really composed of all the colors of the spectrum and each color has a different wave length. These rays of different wave length refract differently and it is therefore impossible to focus light to a point with an ordinary plain lens, since some rays will be focused at a point further from the lens than will others. The amount of difference is called the "dispersion" of that particular lens or glass. The dispersive power is the power of the lens to divide a ray of white light into its primary colors and this varies according to the composition of the glass. Lenses may have the same refractive power (index of refraction), but entirely different power of dispersion. Violet is refracted most of all, yellow is medium and red is refracted the least by any given medium. You will note that with some condensers there is a very heavy ring of violet, fringed with reddish color, at the spot at all times, while with others, when the light is rightly adjusted, it is very slight. Lenses which give the heavy color ring are poor articles. Understand, however, that this color ring may be greatly augmented by improper adjustment of the light.

While the use of glass dates far back into the past, it is only within the past century that it has been used to any extent for light transmission. The first glass used was all some form of what is known as crown glass, but later a glass with greater refractive power, called flint glass, was introduced, it being used to correct color dispersion, when used in connection with crown glass. To-day practically all projection lenses are a combination of crown and flint glass. It will be well, at this point, to illustrate the method of using the two glasses for refractive purposes. In Fig. 28, if A and B be two lenses exactly alike in size and shape, having precisely the same curvature, be made of the same glass they would bring parallel rays to a focus at the same distance from their surface. If, however, one be made of glass having a high refractive power (a very dense glass) and one be made of glass with less power of refraction (less dense glass), the rays would be focused at different distances as shown.

This fact is utilized in the following manner in the construction of projection lenses:

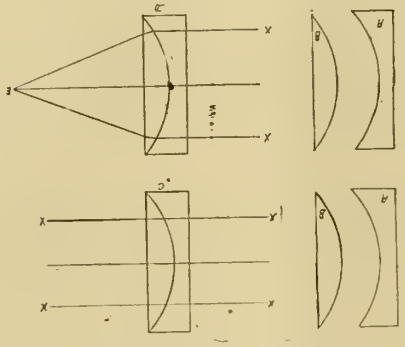

FIG. 29.

In Fig. 29 we see A B, two lenses, A having a very high refractive power (index) of, say 2, ground to a negative focus of three inches. B is a postive lens made of the same glass of the same focus, viz.: three inches. If these two lenses be placed in contact, as at C, the outer surface will be flat and rays X X X X will pass straight through as shown. Now if we take two lenses ground precisely the same as A and B, but A made of a glass having a refractive index of 1.5, its focus will then be 6 inches. The positive factor we will retain as in the previous example, however, viz.: with a three-inch focus. Now, if the two be placed together as at D, we shall find the sides parallel as before, but we shall discover that rays X X are converged and focused at E, and that the combination of a negative 6-inch and a positive 3-inch gives a positive lens of 6-inch focus. Also the use of glasses of different refractive power is necessary to overcome chromatic abberation and other faults present in the single, plain lens. These matters will be treated later.

A Bundle of Questions.—North Carolina (name of town suppressed) writes: "I have been operating in a non-license State and desire to go to a license State where I can get better wages. I have no knowledge of unions or license. Will you please answer the following: (1) Should I join a union, will I be able to go to another licensed State without joining the union there? For instance, if I join the Pennsylvania union, can I operate in any licensed State, such as New York, Illinois, etc.? (2) What will be the fee for joining and how much per month, if anything, afterwards? I understand one pays so much on joining, that being for one year. (3) What are the wages of operators in Chicago and St. Louis? (4) What States are licensed and what ones non-licensed? If St. Louis is licensed, I suppose the license and the union are the same thing. (5) I would like instruction as to what kind of examination I will have to pass. (6) Will it be required that I know names of machine parts; know anything about wires outside the operating room; understand rheostats, economizers, etc.; other things like repairing, wiring, etc.? (7) Is it allowable to use a cord in the operating room to operate switches controlling house lights, same being overhead, out of the way?"

Well, North Carolina, you certainly are not overly well posted as to licenses and unions. A union is an organization of men in the form of a sort of lodge, the purpose being to secure better wages, better conditions of labor and improve things all around. It has absolutely nothing whatever to do with the matter of licensing of operators. Usually operators' unions examine candidates for membership as to their knowledge of operating. This is to protect the union from offering its benefits and protection to incompetent men. Most certainly you would have to know all the things you have named in order to pass an examination, either for membership in a union, or for license. To secure a license you will have to convince the examining board, or examining official, that you have at least a fair, working knowledge of electricity, as well as of projection machines and operating room practice. Initiation fees vary with different unions, ranging from $2 to $25, or even more. Monthly dues of from 35 cents to $1 are exacted thereafter. The license is procured from city officials, or, in some States, from State officials. City license is good only in that city. State license, where obtainable, is good only in that State. License fees vary from nothing at all to $10 per year. A New York City license is not of any value outside New York City. A Massachusetts license is only good in that State, etc. With the union it is different. Having joined, for instance, the New York City union, you can transfer to any I. A. T. S. E. operators' union in the country practically without cost. I trust I have made things clear to you. All operating room wires should be enclosed in metal conduits.

Geneva Trouble.—Racine, Wis., writes: "Am running a 1909 model Motiograph and have trouble as follows: Once every month I clean out the intermittent oil casing, washing it and the parts with gasoline. Before replacing same I cover star with vaseline and add a little light oil. Towards the end of the month the oil casing seems to leak, as the bottom of the machine becomes covered with oil. This is very annoying. Another trouble is: when I put fresh vaseline in the oil-casing the parts seem to catch, or bind, every so often, for the first few days. Does fresh vaseline always act thus or do you think there is something wrong with the framing device? Can you tell me how many amperes I get on each of the four contacts of a "Lemon" arc regulator, made by the Vindex Company? I have 110 volt, 60 cycle current. Plate is marked '50 amperes,' which I supposed to be the maximum capacity. However, my 60 ampere fuses melt when I run on the fourth point. All connections are tight, so that fuse melting is not caused by loose joints."

As to the oil leakage, you are not definite enough. If you mean the outside of the bottom, or mechanism base, gets oily, it would indicate excessive lubrication, but, most likely, oily, it would indicate excessive lubrication, but not unnecessary leakage from intermittent oil casing. If you mean bottom of chamber within frame gets oily, you can get rid of that by removing front plate, cutting blotting paper to fit bottom of chamber, and putting it in. It will absorb all oil until full, when it may be easily and quickly renewed. If you have been running the machine since 1909, with the same intermittent, star shaft, etc., it would not be at all surprising if the casing did leak. Machine parts, no matter how well cared for, won't last forever, you know. Next time you have casing open, examine and see if star and cam shafts are tight in their bushings. If the oil leaks out it most probably is by reason of worn star or cam shafts, or bushings. I would recommend that you try engine valve oil in casing, instead of vaseline. As to the "catch": you say it occurs every so often. Exactly how often does it occur to each turn of the crank? No, fresh vaseline ought not to act that way. Please be more definite in describing the "catch." Remember I am a long way off and can only form an opinion by what you tell me. It is necessary, therefore, if I am to aid you, to be very careful and complete in your description. I am not acquainted with the arc regulator you name—never saw one. Possibly you are using it on higher voltage than it is designed for. Plainly contact 4 gives you more than 60 amperes. Well, if it works O. K. on contact 3, keep it there. Get your light company to measure the amperage on each contact.

Editor Corrected.—Mr. H. P. Walls, Corning, Cal., writes: "Handbook received and must say was agreeably surprised at its completeness. It is worth twice its cost, and then some. Noticed your reply to Oklahoma in last week's issue, pages 1374-5, in which you suggest he build a temporary rheostat. You mentioned No. 8 galvanized wire—about 50 feet. Well, as I wanted to have an extra rheostat in case of accident, I had my electric light man bring me his ammeter. At present I am running 60 amperes, so thought I would be perfectly safe in following your suggestion to Oklahoma. Well, I got 60 feet of No. 8 and wound it on a lathe, built a temporary frame, connected up and cut in and —the ammeter registered 120 until the fuses went, which was real soon. After cutting in 200 feet of No. 8 wire I am pulling 63 amperes. I believe No. 12 would be about the proper size, but cannot procure that size here. Made a rheostat out of No. 14, but was afraid it would burn out, so did not use it."

Well, Neighbor Walls, I'll have to confess my sins, I think. Long ago I made such temporary resistance when on the road. I had forgotten the size wire used, or how much of it. I made a guess, and, it seems, a bad one. However, there was no earthly danger to anything but a fuse, so I trust I may be forgiven this time. Try out that No. 14 rheostat. You cannot injure it since you can switch off the current as soon as it begins to get too hot. Try it out and report, please. I think you will find the No. 14 wire too small for your amperage. In other words, when you get the sixty amperes, the wires will be considerably more than red hot. I hope Oklahoma isn't on his way to New York with a tommyhawk, intent on summary vengeance on the editor.

Photos Promised.—North Tonawanda, N. Y., writes: "I will surely send photo of machine equipped with the shutter in question. I have no camera and the photographer wants five dollars for taking a picture. Besides, the head is my own and is now packed up. I will surely send a photo within a few weeks, however."

All right, Tonawanda, we will await the picture with interest.

Machine Adjustment.—Chicago, Ill., writes: "Will you kindly explain just how to adjust the Powers Six geneva to take up lost motion in intermittent sprocket? Also, how may one tell when the sprocket and flywheel shafts are in line with each other? Things are about as usual here in Chicago, except that the strong-arm element has been eliminated from the union. In the reorganization the former business agent had the nerve to apply for membership. It is needless to say that he was turned down cold. The reorganized union is being conducted along common sense business lines, and the day of the strong-arm, bull-dozer is past."

We are indeed glad to hear this kind of report from Chicago. We most sincerely wish the Chicago men every success. There is no reason why the organization should not become a powerful factor for good. Remember, gentlemen and brothers, that to reap the highest reward of success, justice and common sense must rule your actions. There was a time, long, long years ago, when strong-arm methods were, in many cases, absolutely necessary. That way is no more. A union is a business organization, pure and simple. It should be conducted with the one purpose in view of bettering the conditions of its members in every possible way. This, however, may best be done by proceeding along business lines, just as does any other business organization. The idea of certain of the ex-leaders of the old Chicago union, was to argue by "knockin' 'is d—d block off." That was the only kind of argument a certain few of them knew. That is the last, the very, very last argument resorted to by modern leaders of labor. Even the strike is now recognized generally as the very last resort, after all other methods of obtaining honorable settlement have been tried and have failed. When the writer first became a member of the great army of organized labor, in 1883, committees were seldom sent to the bosses and the "Walking Delegate," as the business agent was then called, was regarded by employers as the very last word in bad things. He was the social leper. He was ridiculed and abused by the press wihtout exception. He was the butt for every "humorist" and the cartoonist, then just in embryo, reveled in caricature of the universally detested walking delegate. In those days we struck and argued afterwards. To-day we have learned better methods. We argue first. We exhaust every resource of diplomacy and then, everything else having failed, we strike, absolutely as a very last resort. Men of the type you mention have not kept up with the procession. They might have succeeded back in 1883. To-day they are failures. And now, Chicago, forgive me this dissertation on labor matters. I just "felt like it." Success to the Chicago brothers, and now to your questions: In the inside edge (edge nearest the sprocket) of the left hand sprocket shaft bushing of the Powers Six, you will see one, two or three small holes. In the end of the right hand bushing you will find a screwdriver slot. Loosen the two setscrews which clamp the bushings and insert a small punch (an eight or tenpenny wire nail, with pointed end filed off, is excellent) and by raising the same you will turn the bushing, which is slightly eccentric, and tighten the geneva against the cam, thus eliminating lost motion in intermittent sprocket. In doing this you should turn the machine at the same time (without film in), tightening the geneva against the cam, by raising on the nail, or punch, until you can feel the machine begin to bind slightly. Slack off a little then, stop the machine, tighten the set-screw which holds bushing, and try machine. If it binds, or there is excessive noise, slack off on the bushing a trifle more. If the bushing turns very hard in its mount you may start it by gently tapping on a small punch held against the edge of the hole, from underneath the machine. The right hand bushing should also be turned about the same amount, in the same direction, as the left one. You may tell when the two shafts are parallel by using a calliper on either side of the intermittent sprocket, both shafts are the same diameter throughout their length.

A Live Wire.—Rarely, though sometimes, a newcomer in the amusement world will make old-timers sit up, take notice and also, to some extent a rear seat. Such one, it seems, is our friend Frank G. Cook, who three months ago knew nothing at all about the show business, but to-day has what is, in some ways, the best appointed airdome in all New York City. Mr. Cook planned and built the airdome himself. It is situated at 109th Street and Manhattan Avenue. The ground lies several feet above the street, sloping gently back, thus forming a natural ampitheater. Mr. Cook has uniformed attendants, illuminated program announcer, a large clock over the entrance, in plain sight of the audience, and the projection is excellent.

We present a picture of the front. Mr. Cook is what is commonly termed a "live wire" and we wish him all possible success.

Larger Carbons.—New Orleans, La., writes: "Do you think there would be any advantage gained through use of larger carbons than five-eights. I would try the matter out, but have been unable to get cored carbons larger than five-eights in this city."

Up to fifty amperes D C or sixty amperes A C there is nothing to be gained by using carbons more than ⅝ inch in diameter. In fact, there is disadvantage. For amperage heavier than that named I would recommend the larger carbons.

Commutators Sparking.—Des Moines, Iowa, asks: "What is the cause of fans sparking, and what is the remedy?"

Presumably, Des Moines, you mean sparking at the brushes. If the sparking is not bad, carefully, and very lightly, sandpaper the commutator, while the fan is running, with No. 00 sandpaper, afterward using a very little of some good commutator compound. Rub a little of the compound on coarse canvas and hold it to the commutator. Don't use much of it, however. If there appears to be a ring, or rings of fire clear around the commutator, take a fan down and carefully, with 00 sandpaper, polish the commutator by rubbing endwise of the bars. The ring of fire is usually caused by a particle of copper pulled over the insulation from one commutator bar to the next. It should be removed immediately.

Cooling the Theater With Ice.—Inquiries have been received concerning the cooling of theaters with ice. I have heard of many houses claiming to do this, also have seen many houses with placards on the front announcing that "This house cooled with ice." Inquiry invariably failed to disclose the actual congealed moisture. Personally the writer has doubted the feasibility of blowing air over ice to cool a theater. It seems as though ice would melt with extreme rapidity; hence the cost be prohibitive.

If any of our correspondents or readers are actually cooling their house with ice I would indeed be glad if they would describe, in detail, the process, giving size of house, length of time one hundred pounds of ice lasts and cost per hour. Also set forth approximate lowering of temperature as compared with ordinary fan cooling. This information will be of distinct value to many managers and, if it exists in fact, its contribution to the department will be appreciated.

Kinemacolor, Chicago, Ill., writes: "We are expecting to see Kinemacolor before long. Can you not furnish some data as to how it is handled? What difference is there in running it from ordinary black and white? How is it threaded? In fact, I would greatly appreciate all the pointers you can give me on the subject."

You have asked a pretty large question, Chicago, though my own knowledge is not as complete as it might be. Now that the machine is perfected I can give advice with much more freedom than I could have done some two months ago. In justice to the Kinemacolor Company I will say that all objections have been entirely removed, and that several American makes of projecting machines have been adapted to the projection of Kinemacolor. The process has been improved to such an extent that scenes of all kinds are now photographed in Kinemacolor with unvarying accuracy. Many of the films are too surpassingly beautiful to be described in words. So much for Kinemacolor itself.

As to the operating, Kinemacolor looks to the casual observer just like any other film. There is a distinct difference, however, since the film must be run at just double the speed of the ordinary stock, the pictures being in pairs. Normal speed of the black and white film is about 60 turns of the crank per minute (16 pictures per second). Therefore, it follows that Kinemacolor crank speed is approximately 120 turns per minute—32 pictures per second. This necessitates great care on the part of the operator, particularly that everything connected with the projector and film be in prfect or nearly as possible perfect condition, also that the machine be carefully and frequently lubricated. Just remember that the Geneva movement is acting approximately 32 times per second, or nearly two thousand times per minute. A good speed for a small circular saw, and you will see the absolute necessity for careful intelligent care and thorough lubrication, with GOOD oil. Don't try any cheap oil on a projector working at Kinemacolor speed. The very best you can get is none too good. Engine valve oil for the gears and the heavy lubricating oil of high grade for the Geneva and bearings is what I would recommend.

Should the film tear, and it become necessary to remove some of it, you must remember that the pictures come in pairs. It takes two pictures to complete one exposure. The pictures are technically known as the reds and greens. On the perforations of each alternate picture you will see a green mark. The pictures opposite the mark are the greens. These pictures must be in front of the aperture when the green light is on and the others when the red light shows. In patching, it is absolutely necessary to see that a red is joined to a green.

Should the green marks be rubbed off an old film, proceed as follows: Usually some object will show darker in the red picture than in the green and vice versa. Observe this carefully, and join a picture in which the object looks dark, to one in which it looks lighter, and you ought to be correct. Make your patches very carefully, remembering the heavy strain patches will be put to at such high speed. Not only scrape the emulsion off the stub ends, but also carefully scrape the back of the other end to remove all oil and roughen the celluloid so that the cement will take good hold. A good workman will do this in making patches in ordinary film, but it is absolutely necessary in Kinemacolor.

Threading is simple, once understood, but it must be done right. You will find the title to only appear on alternate pictures. The title printing corresponds to the green pictures of the film. Thread in the usual way, leaving a tolerably long, but not too long, upper loop. Thread the title printing in exact frame over the aperture, and your red and green pictures will come right. This is of the utmost importance, since the green picture, as has been said, must be showing when the green light is on, and the red when the red light is on. The other way will spoil the whole color effect. If, in patching, you get two reds or two greens joined together, your color effect will be totally ruined after that point is reached in projecting the film. You will be compellel to shut down and frame the film up or down one picture. I lay stress upon these things because they are of paramount importance. In what I say, I am not dealing with the regular Kinemacolor machine, but I am dealing more particularly with my experience with the Powers machine. The regular Kinemacolor projector, while more costly, certainly is a model of modern mechanism, and contrary to the general belief throws black and white pictures perfectly. One thing the operator must do is to look his Kinemacolor films over very, very carefully, and be sure that they are in the best possible condition. Unless he does so he will court trouble and in all probability get it. Another thing, Kinemacolor to show well requires very strong even light. Only the red and green rays are used. This has the effect of weakening the illumination, necessitating heavier amperage. Just how much current required will depend on (a) size of picture and (b) the kind of curtain used. There is no difficulty in getting a good effect with the largest Kinemacolor picture, on a white screen, if a mirror screen or metallic surface curtain is used, I will not stand sponsor for the result. Mind, I do not say that good results may not be obtained from both, but at this time of writing, they are in the experimental stage, and I do not care to be quoted on them for the present. It will probably require 80 amperes D. C. to do it. However, using 5/8 and 7/8 carbons, the larger above, of course, with a good screen, 45 amperes will be ample. Remember, that at the present time, I am guessing this to some extent, but I do not think that I am far from the truth. The machine must be run by a motor for Kinemacolor. The motor must have regulation enough to cut its speed ½ and more, if it is to run ordinary film. The only thing necessary to change from Kinemacolor to ordinary black and white projection is the removal of the color screen, the reduction of speed, and probably cutting down the amperage. To remove the color screen, loosen the screw in its hub which holds same to spindle, and slip it off. Rheostats, or whatever form of current control is used, must be arranged to instantly change from amperage necessary for ordinary projection to that demanded for color work. As to the theory of Kinemacolor, it is essential that the operator understand it, nor can he do so without understanding what happens when the negative film itself is made. In principle, Kinemacolor depends for its effect on the blending of colors through the persistency of vision and the absolute regularity of the register. If you flash the fire shield up and instantly down while the picture is stationary, when the green screen is before the condenser, you will find that the picture is all green. When the red is on, it is all red. The blending of these two colors, as the pictures are exposed at great speed, produces the reds and greens and the various other shades and colors. The remarkable thing about Kinemacolor, if carefully run, seems to be the discovery of not only all the colors, tints and hues of Nature, but it seems to be the Christopher Columbus of black and white. No such blacks and whites are seen anywhere outside of the Kinemacolor pictures. There being two negatives practically, a right and left hand negative, an absolute stereoscopic effect is produced. In getting the colors of Kinemacolor, Mr. Urban seems to have stumbled on two other striking photographic phenomena. The philosophy of all this I have not had time to study out, but there it is before your eyes on the screen.

Caution.—There always ought to be an extra color screen kept on hand in case a hole should be broken in either screen. Also some extra gelatine for the screen must be kept in the operating room. The color screen is nothing but a revolving wheel carrying two sections of colored gelatine. It must be set just as is the front shutter, frame agreed picture over the aperture; turn the machine by its fly wheel until the intermittent sprocket just barely begins to move. Hold fly wheel stationary, having previously loosened the two set screws holding the outer hib to the inner. Revolve the screen caps in the direction it normally runs until the green screen has just covered the aperture. That should be right. As to the regular shutter in front of the lens, it is set in the usual way. I may at some future time go more deeply into the matter of Kinemacolor operators, but I believe what I have said will suffice for the present.

In a conversation with Mr. J. J. Murdock, of the Kinemacolor Company, he informs me that he is having a series of articles prepared on Kinemacolor and its operations. These can probably be had of the Kinemacolor Company.

San Francisco Union Blowout.—Brother W. H. Osterfeldt, vice-president Moving Picture and Projecting Machine Operators Union No. 162, I. A. T. S. E., San Francisco, writes: Our organization has just celebrated its seventh anniversary. The occasion was marked by a banquet at the Toke Point Grill, Friday evening, June 23, and the event is recorded as one of the most enjoyable yet experienced in the history of the organization.

Besides a number of prominent invited guests, 100 members were present. P. H. McCarthy, mayor of San Francisco, wan an honored guest, as were also Frank C. McDonald, civil service commissioner of San Francisco, B. B. Rosenthal, vice-president of the San Francisco Labor Council, W. H. Urmy, Edward Wagner, Ben Williams, Roy Stephens, Leon Bories, manager of the 'Frisco branch of the General Film Co., Ralph Johnson, general manager of the Turner and Dannken Film Co., and Earl Miles, of the Independent Film and Distributing Co.

The White Rats furnished several vaudeville acts for the occasion, booked by Miss Ella o. Weston, that were much enjoyed, and short speeches were made by the mayor and others. On one of the tables was placed a picture machine in use twelve or more years ago, to remind those present of the great strides made in the art of projection.

The menu follows:

THE MENU.

Miles Bros. Independent Blue Point Cocktail, First Fun

Cigarettes 50 Amps.

The fact that the Mayor of San Francisco, as well as other public officials of high rank, attended and participated in the banquet speaks volumes for the standing of Local Union No. 162. By the way, what was the voltage of those cigarettes?

Letters from an Old Exhibitor to a New Film Maker.

First Installment.

Saratoga Springs, 1911.

My dear ————:

I suppose you are too busy, declining scenarios and doing the Belasco act, to read the letters of an idle fellow like myself, who in such a quiet charming place as this has taken off the harness and is gathering new strength for the battle in the fall. People here are far more interested in the brand of their mineral water than the make of their favorite films. Every morning after I have taken my sparkling libations right from the spring I take a walk out to Woodlawn Park and sitting there in an old neglected little summer house, I hold communion with myself and in this crystal clearness of air and light believe me I can see a little into the future and the mistakes of the past look to me so large and plain that they seem to be at the other end of a microscope.

You know one does get acquainted with the dear, dear public as the years roll by and I tell you this talk about the public knowing what they want is the veriest "rot." The public, let me tell you, must be educated. I don't mean to say that the moving picture is to be their post-graduate course, it is that for a good many to a plumb certainty. I mean they must be lifted out of their own ignorance and folly in regard to what is good for them and what without knowing it they really like best. Look at any audience in the land just a minute or two before the curtain goes up, it is like the earth according to the good book in the beginning "void and formless." Unconciously they leave it all to you and me and we can mould them if we know how. The idea of public sentiment or public opinion being born like the goddess in the fable, jumping ready-made out of the head of Jupiter is plain nonsense. Drop a cork on the water and watch it float. Now one current takes it up and now another, presently a touch of the wind drives it into an eddy, here it stops altogether only to be seized at the next moment and borne on with the speed of a belated chauffeur.

There's your image of the public.

The engineer conquers the vagaries of the water by the science of hydraulics and you and I have to conquer by studying the nobler science of man and his mind and heart. The more you learn of that the better and the more popular will be your films. Believe me that wind and water, though to the unthinking they seem so unstable and changeable, are in every single movement obedient to unchangeable laws.

Having made this much clear by way of introduction, we can start on a little tour of observation. The dear public will always follow you, if you can make it understand. Therein lies the difficulty and therein lies your test. You must then get them to listen to you and, most important of all, give you their confidence. Convince them of your honesty. Show that you are willing to give a hundred cents for the dollar. Mere words will accomplish nothing. Advertising will help only when every word in your "ad" will stand the acid-test. There is no better publicity weapon than advertising in the hands of a truth-teller, but the liar advertises nothing successfully except his own capacity as a liar of class. Now right here, old man, let me whisper something to you about your style of advertising. Don't advertise like the patent medicine man. By the way, do you know the sale of the patent medicines has fallen off horribly, just because the public knows more than it did twenty or thirty years ago and got tired of lurid advertising and bogus medicines? Take a warning. Do not, if you please, tell us poor exhibitors that your last release is the best the world has ever seen and that the exhibitor that does not get it must needs die of starvation. Avoid the superlative. Don't say that your particular films are the only ones the public will care to see. You are worse than wasting your advertising space. If you have something good, or if you honestly believe you have and you know you have worked like a Trojan and you and your people's heart has been in the work tell about it in a plain, direct, honest way. Don't think because the other fellow "hollers" louder, he will be believed sooner. Have a little patience—nothing worth while in this world can be got without it—and soon the exhibitor will know that your words, though not flamboyant and in short syllables, are to be relied on. The current will thereupon set in your direction as sure as the sun rises in the east.

I think this is enough for one day. The crowd is going down to dinner, I want to be sure of my table, even if the black servitor gets a dollar a meal for keeping my cool corner safe against all intruders. I will pick up the threads again, when the spirit moves me. O. E.

Comments on the Films

"Russian Gypsy" (Pathe).—This film is colored and effectively brings out the gypsy love of bright tints. It tells a tragic story of a Russian peasant who fell in love with a beautiful gypsy girl. She is false to him, and a few months after he marries her he kills her, with a gypsy man. The arrangement of the scenes suggests an opera. The acting is very good.

"The Water Beetle and Its Young" (Pathe).—These nature study pictures of the Pathe Company are very valuable. This film pictures the habits of a very fierce water bug and shows it and also its young in fierce life-and-death struggles with their prey. It is very instructive.

"The New Editor" (Selig).—Here is a good newspaper story, telling how a young man becomes first assistant editor, then editor, of the Mayville "Clarion." It gives a good exposition of the way some political deals are managed, the illustration of a fight for municipal ownership of waterworks by the women of the town and the difficulties which beset the owner of the paper when he refused to print suffragette items because the political boss told him not to do it. When the editor is last seen he is rapidly climbing a telegraph pole to escape the fury of the women. The hero is made editor by the new owner, who is the leader of the suffragette movement. There is plenty of life in this, and even though the incidents are not entirely probable, they make the best sort of comedy. The mechanical work is well done. The editor is well played by Otis B. Thayer, and the new editor is William Duncan. President Perkins, of the Water Company, is True Boardman, while Mrs. Bussy, the suffragette, is Kaythryn Bond. The daughter is interpreted by Gertrude Bondhill.

"The Passing of Dapple Fawn" (Pathe).—Here is a story with one death in a fight, two suicides, a girl sold to a trapper whom she didn't love. The girl's father, an Indian chief, refuses to permit her to marry Big Bear, her lover, but sells her to a trapper, who takes her away. The Indian lover follows and in the running fight, which, by the way, is spectacular, the Indian is killed. In despair because she must spend her life with this man the girl throws herself over a cliff into the river. Haunted by a vision of her face the trapper soon follows and hurls himself to death from the same point. The mechanical work is excellent, but there is rather too much death to suit the average attendant at motion picture theaters.

"Tin Mines and Foundry in Mulacca" (Pathe).—This interesting picture shows the tin mines and foundries of this little known land, Mulacca. The mechanical work has been done with a thorough understanding of what is required to convey information and there is much of educational value in the film.

"The Jollier" (Kalem).—This lively comedy gives the adventures of a youth who sought to get through the world by jollying people. His jollies with papa didn't go, and so he was put to work. One stenographer left, but the next one saw through him and had him fired from the premises. Bertie's father is so well pleased with her executive ability that he asks her to marry him and informs Bertie that she will be a good mother to him. Frederick Santley as Bertie is at his best in this film.

"The Stepsisters" (Pathe).—Here is a domestic drama presenting the life of a girl so unfortunate as to have a stepmother and stepsister who abuse her. After her father dies she is driven from the house. She is met by her wealthy lover, who proposes to her, but is called back to hear the will read, which gives everything to her. The cruel interlopers get their just deserts.

"Courage of Sorts" (Vitagraph).—Arrested for a crime he did not commit a doctor is sentenced to life imprisonment. He escapes, but in his flight reaches a cabin in which a child is dying of croup. He stops to alleviate her suffering and is captured by the sheriff and his posse. As he is led away by the officers the mother pleads for him, but without avail. The sentiment aroused in every heart will be one of admiration for the man who had the courage to face imprisonment again rather than allow a little one, a stranger to him, to die. Probably few will like this ending. It is not pleasant, but the assertion is ventured that it makes better men and women of every one who sees it. The power of this drama cannot be questioned.

"Rescued in Time" (Lubin).—In this Western picture there is no typically Western scenery; a beautiful but very quiet stream is the background of most of the story. The pretty widow has two lovers; the one who is the villain is rejected. The villain pushes away from the bank the rowboat in which the widow's little girl is sitting; but there is not much suggestion of danger in the boat's floating on that quiet stream. A woman, who has not appeared in the picture until then, jumps in and swims out to the boat, but there are no oars. Indians now get the boat and draw it to shore. At first we do not know whether they are friendly or not, and though, in other places, the mother is shown to be nervous, we can't see any particular danger. The woman who swam to the boat was so unaccountably helpless that we suspected that she was in league with the Indians, whether friendly or not, till we saw her bound. Word is carried to the widow and then cowboys chase the Indians through a not very wild country. There's a pistol fight and the child and woman are rescued. It is not very exciting. The acting is good.

"The Honor of the Flag" (Melies).—This is a story of the Texas border during the recent disturbances. The army is encamped not far from the home of the heroine of the story and soldiers ride to the rescue when it is attacked by a band of Mexican ruffians, who claim to be insurrectos. The story is well laid out and is exciting. A very good picture is shown "Fighting Blood" (Biograph).—In this Western picture an old soldier brings his family up in the true military manner. One day the oldest boy desires to go to see his sweetheart, but his stern military parent objects and says if he goes he goes for good. But the boy goes and returns to find the door barred against him. However, because he is locked out he discovers that a band of Indians is going on the warpath and succeeds in securing the assistance of soldiers in time to save his family and his sweetheart. The military training was helpful. It enabled him to hold the Indians at bay until help arrived. There is a very exciting fight with the Indians shown.

Scene from Biograph's release Fighting Blood.

of a regiment in column of fours. The flag plays a large part in the story, but it is treated respectfully. Miss Story is, as usual, a very acceptable heroine.

"The Star Spangled Banner" (Edison).—This fine and stirring picture tells the story of how the national anthem came to be written by Francis Scott Key. Very skilfully it leads up to the moment of suspense for the patriots, including Key, who were prisoners on Board a British man-of-war when, just before dawn, after the bombardment of Ft. McHenry, they stood wondering whether the flag was still flying. Dawn breaks through the rack of clouds; the fort is seen and the flag is still waving. The audience gave it a ringing burst of applause and at the end, when the starry banner is waved, gave it another.

"One of Nature's Noblemen" (Selig) is a picture worthy of special mention from the fact that it is a presentation of the strength of character possible in many a person and which the usual dramatist seems to ignore. Weakness—pitiable weakness—seems to be the ordinary charactertistic of the average persons usually portrayed; this weakness is too often drawn into a sinful setting with painful consequence, the writers flattering themselves that they have taught a moral lesson if they present the direful effects of wrongdoing. Negative lessons of that kind are always poor. In "One of Nature's Noblemen," the positive nature with a strong character is vigorously presented, a man strong enough to congratuate his more successful rival in love, with an admirable scorn of jealousy and revenge, is a noble yet surely not an uncommon type. In later years, delivering his former rival from great danger and single-handed rescuing his stolen child from a band of Indians, this "nobleman" proves himself animated by principles above the average, and which ought not to be uncommon.

The applause which the play receives shows how people generally admire such a strong, positive and noble character. In its particular line, this is one of the best presented for some time; it is educational in its teaching of true human nature, and will do much to show the value of sterling character and manliness; may it find many others of a similar nature following it to the exclusion of those of a contrary idea.

..The Athletic Carnival of the University of Pennsylvania (Lubin) is a most timely film, agreeing with our recent call for films of this kind for boys and youths; this is the beginning of the supply of a long-felt need. While classed as scenic it is both entertaining and instructive. The events portrayed are relay races, putting the shot, throwing the hammer, broad jump, high jump, and pole vaulting. Each event is most clearly depicted at close range; the athletes are splendid specimens of young manhood and the skill and prowess are really professional. The only lack of interest is the fact that the results of the events are not shown. A picture of a baseball game would lose its value if the final event were not recorded. So inathletic contests, to record the results gives not only a finish, but gives a thoroughness which is desirable.

"The Novice."—This Selig film is a strong one, deserving a better title, yet, because of its strong, positive moral teaching, deserves recognition on this page. The full story will be found in its proper place on page 1391. The novice displays remarkable integrity and uprightness while the scheming of his uncle with hired bandits is justly frustrated. The calm dignity of the Franciscan Fathers is attractive and really eloquent in righteous virtue. The final scene, in which a wanton woman paid to trap and dishonor the novice is frustrated, and the test at the alter, where, in the presence of righteousness she collapses in fear rather than to swear to her dishonorable and untruthful accusations, thereby vindicating the novice, who receives the congratulations and blessing of the Fathers, make a good and teachable picture story.

"Little Soldier of '64" (Kalem).—The Kalem people have scored another artistic success in this film. The first scene is a fine old Southern cabin with its crane an open fireplace. After that the story has mostly battlefields for background. There's a stirring scene at the ferry when the Yankees are beaten off and the "little soldier," the wife of the story's hero, who in disguise is following her husband, is saved and taken aboard the boat. Very few indeed will find fault with the battle scenes. The picture of the field hospital where the "little soldier" finds the wounded husband is very realistic. The last scene is beautiful and enobling. The whole play is well acted and very commendable.

"Jimmie's Trick" (Gaumont).—The Gaumont Company's little player, Jimmie, is one of the most gifted of all the picture players. This picture, though, isn't nearly so amusing as they usually are when Jimmie plays. The fault is hardly Jimmie's, for the story made him take the part of one of those terrible children. He sees that Aunty has filled her bag with sugar lumps. Jimmie's trick merely shows Aunty up, which isn't very funny.

"Washington Relics" (Pathe).—This educational and very interesting film is likely to prove popular with all sorts of audiences. Beginning with a picture of the beautiful white shaft of marble that marks the birthplace of George Washington, it gives a series of views of places that the great Father President of this country knew. It is very welcome indeed.

"The New Faith" (Selig).—This is a story of a Roman noble, Claudius Valerius, who was converted to the Christian faith by one of his slave girls, and who suffered martyrdom. The story is fairly clear and well acted, especially by the man who plays Valerius. The settings of many of the scenes are extremely beautiful; white summer palaces, sunken gardens, with fountains and mirror pools, making backgrounds very suggestive of Roman days. The fact that the play is a mixture of a religious story and a love story somewhat weakens its effect; but the film is very acceptable.

"The Quaker Mother" (Vitagraph).—This play is very truly a life portrayal. The Quaker mother's married daughter is about to elope with another man, but is saved by this dear old lady, who tells her that her little child is very sick and in sore need of her. The film is somewhat weakened by an unnecessarily lengthened preliminary statement; there are too many introductory scenes; some of them are not needed. But the moment that the situation begins to be portrayed by Julia Swayne as the young wife, the picture becomes very effective. The people will surely respond sympathetically to the scene in which the Quaker mother first meets the interloper. One doesn't see how he could help feeling like trash; in truth, he didn't meet her eyes. The situation is made to tell strongly by remarkable acting all around, and the play is worthy of high praise.

"The Old Man's Folly" (Essanay).—This domestic story tells over again the danger which lurks in an old man marrying a young woman, especially when that woman happens to be an actress. He repents of his folly, but not until his daughter has been driven from home. He finds her through the medium of the motion picture. Meantime, the actress' former husband has been released from prison and they plot to obtain the old man's money. This is frustrated, however, and the father and daughter return to live happily ever after, it is presumed.

"The Sheriff's Brother" (Essanay).—This Western story deals with the old subject of a sheriff finding his brother is an outlaw. He had promised his dying mother years before to find the brother if possible. Then he urges the outlaw to make his escape, while the outlaw urges the sheriff to arrest him. Rather than compromise the sheriff, the man kills himself. The posse bursts into the cabin and is surprised to find the sheriff weeping over the outlaw's dead body.

"An Oasis in the Sahara" (Gaumont).—Here is a film showing the life on an oasis in the desert. It gives an excellent idea of what the people are and how they live. And probably it shows more graphically than is realized the importance of the date industry in those desert regions. The pictorial work is good, most of the scenes being unsurpassed in their beauty. Like all of Gaumont's outdoor pictures, this is worked out with extreme care and is attractive.

"The Little Rebel" (Lubin).—Here is a war story with a novel plot, turning upon the love a young lieutenant feels for a Southern girl in whose mother's house his command was quartered. The girl never omitted an opportunity of showing her hatred of him and his cause. One day, while the Union officers are discussing plans, she overhears, and undertakes to get to the Confederate lines. She is detected by the lieutenant and shoots him. When brought back she refuses to tell why she shot him, and he, to save her, declared that she had a perfect right to do it. The war closes and the young man finds his way back to the Southern plantation, where he receives a very different reception and ultimately there is another union of the North and South. The picture is lively, the heart story is interesting and there are the war scenes, which add to its attractiveness. It should be popular at this season, when patriotism runs high.

"The Thief and the Girl" (Biograph).—This very pretty play is a variant on an old theme. The story is freshly told and makes an interesting picture. The heroine, well known in Biograph pictures, is very pretty in this part which doesn't require imaginative acting. The gentleman-thief is also played with a pleasing restraint through a very melodramatic situation. The backgrounds are unusually beautiful.

"The Great Heart of the West" (Melies).—When Jack arrives out West, a consumptive without money or strength for work, he finds friends who set him on his feet and in a short time he is well and strong and doing a man's work. There's a love story in it. He is able to do a young girl a favor; he lends her his horse. He starts toward home with her; but when the two are shown as arriving, another man has taken his place and represents him for one scene. This may not be noticed by many. The picture ends when Jack's mother arrives and the young lady is introduced.

Independent.

"A Western Waif" (American).—In this story a girl whose father dies in the desert is picked up unconscious by a cowboy and taken to the ranch where friendship speedily ripens into love. Later the cowboy discovers she can't read and decides to send her East for a year's schooling. When she returns, the polish deceives him and he leaves, only to be followed by her and brought back. Then he realizes the full measure of her devotion. The story is simple, but the settings are all good. The desert scenes are particularly attractive because they reproduce what the desert actually is. The Western characters are drawn with accuracy and the entire picture moves with a swing which holds the attention of the audience throughout.

"A Fascinating Widow" (Solax).—The experiences of two friends, men, whose course of mutual affection ran smoothly enough until a certain widow appeared on the scene, are told in this lovely comedy. Troubles began. They gather in the parlor and the friends demand that she choose between them. McSweeney flashes a roll of bills which decides the case. While he is taking a bath Herman steals his clothes and before McSweeney has succeeded in securing other apparel Herman and the widow are on their way to the church and McSweeney arrives just in time to see the ceremony concluded. The most he can do is smile and look pleasant, no matter how he feels.

"The Gunfighter" (Nestor).—This Western film has the liveliness to be expected in Nestor Westerns, and it also has Nestor photography. We have an escape of the outlaw from the saloon after he is discovered; the chase, his aid of a girl who proves to be a sister of the man who discovered him, his helping her home, only to meet the sheriff and his posse. There is a wild, Western swing to this which carries one forward regardless of his will. And the audience awaits the result of the attempt to get the wounded girl home. Perhaps there is a feeling that it is better to have him die as he does, rather than to be captured and maybe executed by the representatives of the law.

"A Terrible Catastrophe" (Solax).—A bad boy tied a baby carriage to the back of a grocer's wagon. There was only a doll in it, but the people of the small country village thought it was a baby. Many followed the grocer's fast horse, running and shouting; the crowd seems to hold many, especially of the small boy kind, who were not paid to act. There is some good fun in the picture and comical running, but it would have been better if the grocer's wagon had had a closed back.

"On the Edge of the Bad Lands" (American).—This Western picture shows mountain scenes and lowland scenes and tells a love story. The mountaineer who got the job on the ranch in the valley fell in love with the cowgirl. A jealous member of the bunch put the paysack in his bag and accused him of theft. The girl saves him and we have a picture of a running pistol fight up the mountain side. The girl gets help from the man's mountain friends and he is saved. It's an interesting but not an important picture.

"Lorna Doon" (Thanhouser).—The true lover of Blackmore's "Lorna Doon," and they are many, will be disappointed in this picture as a picture of the story. It is, however, an interesting moving picture. The John Ridd of the picture is a big fellow, but his size does not give a convincing reason for the marvelous success of his prowess. This is the picture's one fault; it makes it seem too much like a certain kind of boy's story. Little Marie Eline is in the picture and she, with all the other players, acts it very well.

"The Gentleman Fireman" (Itala).—The fireman of the French town in which this story is placed was indeed a gentleman. It saved him from knowing how foolish his wife had been. After his gracious action her repentance is very convincing. It's a good film.

"Securing Evidence" (Rex).—This is a Coney Island film; it shows some of the good things the jolly island affords and it's almost as much fun to watch it as the real thing is—in some ways more, for the fun isn't costing real money every minute. According to the comedy, a short-sighted man has seen his wife's dress on his wife's serving maid going down the street with a strange man and he hires a photographer to get evidence. The man takes the maid to Coney Island and the photographer earns his money. To get evidence he has to take nearly all Coney Island and he and others in the picture have many amusing adventures. It's end is also amusing. We heartily commend it.

"The Coronation of George V" (Warrick).—This film shows the royal party on its way to and from the Abbey. Some of the pictures are good, but some are not so distinct. A man seated near this reviewer picked out several of the great dignitaries as they passed, among them Lord Roberts. The royal coach passes several times and King George and Queen Mary, their crowns upon their heads, are seen. We also see the "Beefeaters" and other famous military organizations.

"Cowboy's Vacation" (Bison).—This is almost wholly a rough, horse-play picture. This Bison cowboys took a day off and went to the great amusement park at Los Angeles. They took girls with them and also a farmer whom they picked up and whom they made drunk. One would hardly call it a refined picture.

"Bill Determines to Go" (Lux).—This farcial comedy introduces a chase of a man carrying another hidden in a 'cello. He goes to an "at home" inside the 'cello and when the player undertakes to coax his usual harmonious strains from the instrument Bill inside blows a penny trumpet. Then clouds of smoke issue from the instrument. Next begins the chase which is through the crowded streets of a city, ultimately ending at a stream where the owner runs because of a shot and Bill flounders in the water convulsed with laughter. It is a live comedy and brings laughter.

"Shortsighted Miss Prim" (Lux).—This comedy details the adventures of the shortsighted principal of a girls' school. A number of young fellows don poke-bonnets and follow her on one of her walks. They leave her at a cafe and she does not discover her mistake until she has gone some distance. She finds the girls all demurely sewing when she arrives at the school building, but even though they declare they have not been away she gives them a good scolding, and to make it worse the boys look through the windows and enjoy it.

"Greater Love Hath No Man" (Solax).—This story is laid in a Mexican mining town. It tells of unrequited love. The girl falls in love with the new superintendent of the mine, and though the young man who lover her is heartbroken he does not seek revenge. On the contrary, when the Scenes from Eclair's production "The Prodigal Son."

"hands" revolt and determine to kill the superintendent it is the disappointed lover who helps him and the girl to escape. When pursued they seek refuge in a narrow pass. From there the superintendent and the girl ride away for aid on the only horse. They return with soldiers shortly, but the young man has given his life for the one he loved.

"The King's Favorite" (Great Northern).—This story set in beautiful scenes—one of which is the court of a magnificent palace, another the palace garden, etc.—is not very clear. One reason for this is the difficulty of keeping personalities separate, where there are several young men who look somewhat alike. The actors are graceful and the story is acceptable.

Scene from "Wallace to Grant." Champion release for July 10.

"The Orphan" (Reliance).—This is an extremely pretty love story. Farmer Grouch and his whole family were always cross and ugly with each other, but gradually, after the orphan came to live with them, a marked change for the better was apparent. The minister falls in love with the orphan and Farmer Grouch reluctantly lets her accept him. The whole cast does good work in this picture, but the heroine is especially praiseworthy.

"Foolshead, Waiter" (Itala).—Foolshead as usual shows that he has much ingenuity for getting into scrapes and out again. It is a very amusing picture.

"In the Sultan's Garden" (Imp).—This picture though, artistically, it is one of the weakest that the Imp Company has released in some time, has many of the qualities that audiences like. It tells the love story of a Yankee naval officer and one of the ladies of the Sultan's harem. The intrique is discovered and Haidee is sown in a sack and thrown into the Bosphorus. The lieutenant is about to be killed by the Sultan's firing squad, when United States tars, who have been warned by none other than Haidee, who has cut her way out of the sack, arrive in time and fire first. The imagination of some people is not critical and they enjoy such a picture, though to others it may seem very unconvincing.

Scene from "A Doll's House." Ibsen drama filmed by the Thanhouser Company.

"Can He Save Her" (Eclair).—We are shown in this picture that, in a village where a mad man is at large, a family is holding a little party to celebrate grandmamma's birthday. The mother of the family has gone to the house of one of her poor neighbors on a charitable errand and the children are watching her through a telescope set up near the table in the garden. Suddenly they see the madman running toward her with a big club. The question is, can the father of the family get there in time t osave her? oe succeeds. The picture is well acted and fairly well conducted; it will be acceptable.

"Tommy Wants To Be An Actor" (Eclair).—Tommy is not less amusing in this slight farce than he usually is. The end of it, whesn the spectators at a moving picture show in which Tommy's acting is pictured, arise and crown him with laurel is very amusing indeed.

Scene from "Temptation of a Great City." Special three-reel feature being issued by the Monopol Film Company. This picture is one of the strongest melodrama pictures that has been done in some time. The Monopol people are putting it out on the state rights plan only.

Horsley's Trip with Mutt and Jeff.

David Horsley has returned from a very unusual trip. On June 4th, he started away from New York City with three reels of film in his traveling bag. The object of his trip was to exploit the beginning of the Mutt and Jeff pictures as a regular Nestor Saturday release. Incidentally he took along the "Parson and the Bully" and "The Gun-Fighter," to show what the Nestor Company is producing in the way of Western story pictures.

Mr. Horsley's trip was unusual by reason of the fact that it was the first scheduled journey that we know of its kind.

David Horsley.

For two weeks he was doing what might be called "one night stands," with audiences previously arranged for. The itinerary was conceived and executed by wire in the very short space of two days and called for a trip extending over a period of three weeks and covering territory to the extent of 6,000 miles.

It is the ambition of the Nestor people to establish a reputation for comedy. Instead of being content with an occasional or intermittent comedy release, they feel it is due the exhibitor that there should be more definite arrangements in the matter of comedy productions. The Nestor people wish to become known as a concern that releases comedy, not when they want it, but when the exhibitor wants it. Saturday night is a big night for comedy and Mutt and Jeff has been given to the trade as a Saturday comedy standby. First-run customers from this on may be sure they are going to get comedy on Saturday without any extra trouble and when Mutt and Jeff become the furor that indications seem to predict, so much the better.

This, then, was the principal object of Mr. Horsley's flying trip. His coming was well advertised in advance through the various exchanges in all the large cities which he visited. Arrangements were made by local exchanges with one of the theaters in each city visited to which the local exhibitors were invited, as well as those in nearby towns. This idea was augmented also by a large full-page advertisement in the Moving Picture World, setting forth the exact itinerary of Mr. Horsley's personal visit, and by these means the affair was a decided success. So worked up were the managers by the prospect of something new in the way of comedy that in many cases they vied for the honor of having Mr. Horsley and the other exhibitors as their guests. The genial Nestor manager on his return, reports that his progress was a continued ovation wherever he went. As the advance agent of "more comedy" he was hailed something in the light of a savior and the incident goes to show how hungry are the exhibitors for comedy, which is merely another way of saying that the public is hungry for comedy, because the exhibitor reflects the wishes of the public. Hence the demand for Western pictures. The majority of film manufacturers have harkened to the call for Western stuff, but for some strange reason few of them have harkened to the call for comedy.

Beginning at New York City, June 4, Mr. Horsley visited in rotation, allowing a day for each, the following cities in the order named: Detroit, Toledo, Chicago, Milwaukee, Minneapolis, St. Paul, Omaha, Kansas City, Oklahoma City, Dallas, New Orleans, Birmingham, Atlanta, St. Louis and Indianapolis. While Mr. Horsley was doing this missionary work in the West, Mr. James McIntyre, of the Nestor Company, leaving New York on the same day, made a series of one night stands, showing the same reels in Philaudelphia, Boston, Albany, Montreal, Toronto, Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati, Pittsburg, Washington and Baltimore. The results of the trip were very good, so we are told by the genial David, every Independent film exchange with the exception of four having placed a standing order for the Mutt and Jeff series. The regular Nestor dramatic releases were also increased by many more standing orders, which is all the more remarkable in view of the fact that Mr. Horsley did not solicit a single order, for, to use his own expression, he is "not that kind of a boy."

The exhibitors were delighted wherever the pictures were shown, and the exchange men fell in with the scheme at once. One of the main objects of the trip was to demonstrate the feasibility of the talking picture adjunct of the Mutt and Jeff reels. In order to do this, it was necessary to bring the exhibitors together from surrounding towns and let them see that the conversational reel is one that does not call for one penny of additional expense. As soon as the exhibitors saw what the idea was, they were pleased and at once began to clamor for the product. The majority of them came with their wives and friends to the various theaters. Mr. Horsley made a multitude of friends and acquaintances, and became quite the man of the hour in moving picture circles wherever he appeared.

Our friend David returned to New York with very glowing accounts of the West. He thinks that the Western theaters and moving picture houses are far superior to those of the East and was very much impressed by the way they do things out yonder. Shortly after his return he was obliged to make another special trip to St. Louis, Indianapolis and Chicago for the benefit of picture men who had missed his first call. He said also that there were many calls for him from smaller towns where he could not spare the time to go. All during his trip he slept only two nights in a hotel; the other nights he spent in peaceful slumber in Pullman cars. On the whole, the trip was rather unique, that of a film manufacturer playing a regular theatrical engagement by way of demonstrating reels. In conclusion we are pleased to add Mr. Horsley's voluntary statement that almost every exhibitor with whom he spoke was either a subscriber to the Moving Picture World or bought it on the news stands.

Declaration of Independence.

On the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the signing of the Declaration of Independence, Daniel Webster delivered an oration in Faneuil Hall, Boston, in which he said: "Let us, then, bring before us the assembly, which was about to decide a question there big with the fate of empire. Let us open their doors, and look in upon their deliberations. Let us survey the anxious and careworn countenances—let us hear the firm toned voice of this band of patriots.

"Hancock presides over this solemn sitting, and one of those not yet prepared to pronounce for absolute independence is on the floor and is urging his reasons for dissenting from the Declaration. It was for Mr. Adams to reply to arguments like these. We know his opinions and we know his character. He would commence with his accustomed directness and earnestness."

Had Daniel Webster lived in these days he would have rejoiced to see with the natural eye a reproduction of that scene which his oratory sought to portray before the mind's eye. The occasion to which he referred is most faithfully and vividly portrayed in the Thanhouser production of the Declaration of Independence. It seems a pity to have these pictures unaccompanied by the inspiring words of Webster which they recall to the mind of all who have read them.

This film is a most valuable one, as it attempts to record in a way peculiar to the value of the moving picture one of the most thrilling scenes in the history of the world, and perhaps the most vital scene in the history of this greatest republic. The appearance of Benjamin Franklin is noteworthy, doubtless intending to present him as expressing those famous words, "We must all hang together or assuredly we shall hang separately; also the portrayal of Adams in his memorable speech (to which Webster referred) wherein he said, "Sink or swim, live or die, survive or perish, I give my hand and my heart to this vote." These scenes alone give an historical and an everlasting value to this film which will find its way into the schools, not for an annual inspiration, but for constant and continued educational purposes. The forceful character of John Hancock is good, especially so in the actual presentation of his signing his name first to the famous declaration; the righteous boldness of this, presented in facsimile, is a valuable incident.

Apart from the important scenes mentioned, other events of interest, including Hancock's courtship and marriage to Dolly Quincy, are attractive. The inclusion of Paul Revere in his memorable ride, and the first fighting at Lexington when the farmers repulsed the British soldiers are important. While this subject is one worthy and capable of enlarging upon, it is a welcome addition to that class of film for which this page is constantly calling, it will deserve and earn success because its acceptability commends it.

In the future it will find a place equal in value to the written historical records, and second in importance only to the original occasion it so graphically represents.

High Class Advertising.

One of the most modern and up-to-date advertising methods that has ever been offered to the exhibitors of motion pictures has just been placed on the market by the Exhibitors Advertising Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Illinois, with general offices at suite 604, 605, 606, 117 North Dearborn Street, Chicago. An ad appeared in the World last week under the name of the Modern Methods Advertising Company, but it was afterwards learned that there was some sort of an advertising company at Elgin, Ill., with a name somewhat similar, so the company decided to change the name to the Exhibitors Advertising Company.

The purpose of this company, as we understand it, is to give to the exhibitors of motion pictures a class of advertising altogether different and of a higher class than anything that has heretofore been offered and at a price so low that it will be within the reach of even the exhibitor who only runs but one reel of film a day.

The company sells to the exhibitor a large oak frame 6 feet high and 3 feet wide, with six compartments, each compartment being 8 x 28 inches in size, and furnishes for the price of two dollars per week the entire output of Licensed or Independent posters for all films released. By this system it is impossible for an exhibitor to be without a poster for each and every picture run, as these posters are mailed to any address in the United States or Canada on Wednesday of the week prior to week reels are released. So that an exhibitor in San Francisco, New York, New Orleans, or any other place, will have all posters before he can get his films even though he uses first runs.

The system is very complete in every way and one which we believe will become very popular.

"An Aeroplane Disaster."

Successfully Filmed by Gaumont and Being Released by George Kleine, on August 1st."

On May 22nd, the following headlines appeared in the Chicago Tribune, and similar announcements in the papers throughout the country:

"Paris Aero Kills Minister of War; Injures Premier. Train's Monoplane, Starting Race, Dashes into Distinguished Grou. Accident Seen by 200,000. Prime Minister Monis, His Son, and Henri Deutsch Crushed Under Wreckage. Aviator and Companion escape. Aviation Fatalities of Year 13

Paris, May 21.—France paid a terrible toll today for her endeavor to attain supremacy of the air, when a monoplane, the driver of which had lost control, plunged into a group of members of the cabinet, who had gathered to witness the start of the race from Paris to Madrid, killing the minister of war and injuring the prime minister, his son, and a well known sportsman.

THE DEAD:

Henri Maurice Berteaux, minister of war.

THE INJURED:

Antoine Emmanuel Ernest Monis, premier and minister of the interior.

Antoine Monet, son the premier. Henri Deutsch de la Mourthe, the aged patron of aeronautics, automobiling and other sports.

Many others, persons of note, narrowly escaped injury.

IMMENSE CROWD SEES DISASTER.

The accident occurred on the aviation field at Issy les Molineux, where 200,000 persons had gathered to see the start of the race.

M. Train was piloting the monoplane that wrought such havoc. With him in the car was M. Bounier, a passenger. Neither of these men were injured. The machine was wrecked."

The film shows with remarkable clearness the incidents connected with this fatal accident. The camera registered the fall of the car clearly and shows near views of the wrecked machine, while the injured are being removed.

There are also several excellent pictures of the injured officials, which were taken within a week before the casualty.

Growth of the Wichita Film & Supply Company.

In September, 1909, two brothers by the names of C. E. Olson and E. G. Olson, rented a couple of small rooms in the building located at 122 N. Market Street, Wichita, Kan., and embarked in the moving picture industry, with a company known as the Wichita Film and Supply Company, selling projecting machines, opera chairs, and renting Independent films. Many of their friends predicted that their business would never be a success as the town hadn't a very prospective future, but since then, their business has so greatly increased, that they have been forced to lease the entire floor and besides employ twelve individuals. Exhibitors from nearly every surrounding State began to obtain service from them and to-day their capital is $35,000. Olson Brothers operate in conjunction with the Consolidated Booking Agency and the Capitol City Amusement Company, which controls twelve theaters. They have recently formed a new corporation, of which W. R. Savage is president; D. C. Cunningham, vice-president; C. E. Olson, secretary, and E. G. Olson. A prosperous future is before them and we wish them luck.

MONOPOL FILM CO.

P. P. CRAFT, Gen. Mgr. 145 W. 45th St., N.Y.

Write to-day for territory.

The following article, which we advise you to read, appeared in the June 17th issue of The Moving Picture World: "We were favored with an advance view this week of a three-reel subject, produced by the Great Northern Company, of Denmark, entitled 'The Temptations of a Great City.' The American rights for this excellent picture have been secured by Mr. P. P. Craft, of the Monopol Film Company. The picture is one of the best-acted films that it has ever been our pleasure to witness. To those of our readers who remember that excellent Pathe picture, 'The Hand,' we would say that this Danish picture is on a par with that sterling little drama of some three years ago, which was acted by three persons in a way that has probably never been surpassed. The entire three reels of 'The Temptations of a Great City,' are acted by four strong characters, with no other characters, except an occasional lackey or policeman. The part of the waiter, who is also a money-lender to the gilded youth whom he serves, is really a masterpiece of character work. 'The Temptations of a Great City' is melodrama, pure and simple. It does not claim to be anything else. It can be called high-class melodrama. In it there are no shooting scrapes, or sensational situations of the stereotyped kind. It is a simple drama of cause and effect, well told, with surprisingly few sub-titles. The four principal characters are the money-lending waiter and his simple daughter, playing at cross purposes with a society matron and her prodigal son. The film tells, in a way, the old story about a fool and his money, or, in this case, other people's money: particularly his mother's money and the money-lender's money. He gets his spending money from the money-lending waiter. The young spendthrift pays it back by wheedling it out of his mother. This keeps up until financial matters between the families are so hopelessly snarled up that it leads to a crisis, or climax, which nothing on earth can settle except an elopement between the prodigal son and the waiter's daughter. There are many strong situations throughout the piece. The staging and photography are perfection, therefore we need not dwell on that subject. In one scene there is an ingenious mirror effect, and later on, in the same scene, a wonderful moonlight effect. The picture is entirely a studio product, but the scenes are so interesting that the time and the place are forgotten by the spectator, whose interest is held every moment of the time. We noticed one thing very particularly in this European picture, and that is the fact that the Europeans are 'stealing our stuff.' Ordinarily in a Danish picture one would expect the foreign style of acting, such as the shrug of the shoulders and the drag of one foot after the other, and all the rest of the stereotyped styles of the European school. The Europeans are getting wise to facial expression. If it were not for a telephone that looked like a wedding cake and a policeman with a brass kettle on his head, no one would know that it is a foreign film. Not only that; if the Americans do not watch closely, the European actors are going to beat them at their own game of facial expression, because the four actors in this Danish film were certainly going some in the gentle art of suppressed emotion. It reminded the writer of the palmy days of the Biograph Company, when tense situations were worked up entirely with the eyes and slight movement. This film came as near to being one of the old Biograph masterpieces as anything that ever came from Europe, and it is good to observe that the Europeans are beginning to see some merit in the American school of acting. America is heartily sick of the shoulder-shakers, and it is possible that Europeans are sick of it themselves. We have not said a great deal about the story, because in our opinion it is not the strongest plot that has ever been written, but it is ordinarily good. It holds the interest like a vise all the way through, which in itself is a very strong recommendation for any film. It is not an immoral film, and yet it preaches no great moral sermon, except the old stand-bys such as the moth and the flame, the prodigal son, wine, woman and song, and all that sort of thing. But withal it is good—very good; and as those subjects never grow old, it is necessary, from time to time, to have good, fresh material touching on and appertaining to. The story is about a young man whose spending ability is as large as his earning ability is small. He spends every cent he can get on gay dinner parties with the weariness that stays awake for hire. All this takes money, and he finds that it is easier to borrow money than to earn it; therefore his close connection with the fawning waiter, whose part is so very well played. In the cold, gray dawn of the morning after, the fawning waiter of the night before is an independent, arrogant Shylock. He assumes the airs of a banker, and to him it is the young man's turn to cringe and beg for time. Were it not for the fact that the money-lender has a daughter, whom he houses like a bird in a cage, the spendthrift youth would probably have gone to jail. The picture shows how the miser made his great mistake by being miserly even with his daughter. He locked the door and the bird flew out of the window. When the young man came to beg for time he found opportunity to make a conquest of the money-lender's simple-hearted daughter, which later ended in marriage. The reader will perceive in the four contrasting characters a wealth of dramatic possibilities. A plebeian, domineering waiter contrasted against an aristocratic widow; her college bred son eloping with a bourgeois' daughter. The contempt of the aristocratic widow for her son's plebeian wife, which is further complicated by the riches being on the plebeian side and the poverty on the patrician side, and all these conditions stirred up nicely together make 'The Temptations of a Great City' one of the strongest melodrama reels that has 'come across' in a long time. The interest is so strong that one actually becomes impatient while the reels are being changed. We would advise exhibitors to use two machines, if possible, when showing this film." The above article from The Moving Picture World is an unbiased opinion. It is reproduced herewith word for word without any attempt to "blue pencil" the weak spots nor to underline the strong points. There were one or two points not touched upon by the reviewer that it might be well to add. The tinting throughout the scenes imparts much life to this picture and makes it "snappy" all the way through. The scenic effects are natural. By natural is meant that there is no straining to appeal to the eye with a plethora of gaudy "ginger-bread" interiors made on the style of circus wagons. Where the plot calls for a "parlor fancy" the demand is met with refined taste and original arrangement. The other scenes are normal in proportion. As to the acting of the picture, there is nothing that can be said on that point that has not been already covered by the reviewer, except to say that the actors are four of the leading players of Denmark, whose names in that country stand among the highest rank in their profession. "Temptations of a Great City" is a film that advertises well. It is one of those features that will justify a week's hooking.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

In conversation with a member of the Vitagraph Company these words are quoted from our interview with him and we know they will meet popular approval and coincide with general opinion: "Some of the theatrical managers are having a merry little war by themselves, cutting and slashing prices to win the gallery gods. While they are lowering their prices the motion picture producers are constantly raising the standard of their plays and that is the answer. It is not a question of price, it is quality that wins the patronage; besides there are no gallery gods in the photoplay houses, everybody comes in on the ground floor, on the same level; the masses and the classes see a splendid performance for the same price.

The increased output of the Vitagraph Company has made necessary the enlargements of their facilities and their force has been added to by the employment of a larger staff of directors and several well-known players who will be seen in the August and September releases, which promise to be the best in the history of this company. On the north end of the company's premises a large garage and storage building is being erected.

At a private exhibition given by the Vitagraph Company of America before the Kings County Sunday-school Union, at which seventy-five Sunday-schools were represented, the film taken by the Vitagraph Company, of President Taft reviewing the Brooklyn Sunday-schools' annual parade on June 8th, and different sections of the procession, was shown. In addition "The Battle Hymn of the Republic" was run, showing the audience the character of films which are being produced for general exhibition and the edification of the public.

In the year 1040 A. D., the Lord of Coventry imposed severe taxes on the inhabitants of Coventry. His wife, the Lady Godiva, having the welfare of the town at heart, besought her husband to remove the burden of taxation from the people. To escape her pleadings, he said:

"I will grant your request on the condition that you will ride naked through the town."

He was astonished at her answer: "If you will give me your leave to do so, I will."

Supposing she would not make good, he granted his permission, and clothed only in her hair, which was long and abundant, she rode through the town, and thus the people were relieved from the heavy exactions imposed upon them.

The story of Lady Godiva will be depicted by the Vitagraph Company, who, with its usual good judgment and marvelous facilities, will produce a portrayal that will not only be valuable as a matter of general information and rare attractiveness, but the subject will be extremely picturesque and dazzlingly beautiful in its every detail, introducing to our notice quaint streets, manners, customs and costumes of the people of the eleventh century.

The Duke of Reichstadt, the only son of Napoleon I, who lived a short but eventful life, has been chosen as the subject for one of the Vitagraph future releases. It furnishes a splendid opportunity to present an extravagant portrayal of profound significance and unusual magnificence.

This is a timely announcement and will prepare us for a great treat, that is very near at hand.

POWERS IN NEW QUARTERS.

On Monday, July 3rd, the Powers Company will be installed in their new temporary plant at Nepera Park, on the Fulton Division of the New York Central, twelve miles from New York City. The building is 40 x 385 feet, with two wings 50 feet square. In the rear is a large yard with a natural brook running through. The building proper is ideally constructed for its present use. One of the wings is a studio, and the other one the boiler and machine room. The drying room is most commodious, containing space enough for the hanging of 3,000 frames. There also is a large loft now being used at present with a capacity for 10,000 frames. The developing room is equipped with the latest improved plumbing and acid-proof tanks with splendid drainage facilities. There are twelve printers, five perforators and three new polishing machines, the invention of Ed. Murphy and Tom Evans. Strangely enough, the first film to be developed and printed in the new plant was that of the famous Powers fire, showing the destruction of the old studio. An excellent system of fire protection has been installed, with a 50-pound water pressure.

A YANKEE "BEAT."

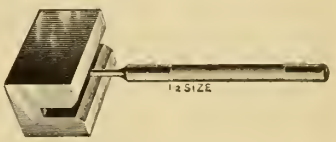
Characteristic of the Yankee progressiveness, they have again obtained a special "beat" by securing 1,400 feet of perfect negative of scenes in and about the largest ship in the world—the Olympic of the White Star Line, on her maiden voyage from Europe.

The importance of this film cannot be overestimated, as very few, indeed, were the the fortunate ones who obtained a glimpse of this magnificent ocean greyhound.

We understand that only 450 feet of this splendidly interesting subject will be used in conjunction with a comedy that will make up a full reel. So little is known or seen of these floating palaces that its gigantic proportions will prove a great surprise to those who have no idea of the wonders on shipboard. In all, there are over 16 scenes, including views of preparations before leaving—the film having been taken fifteen minutes before sailing time, when there were almost four thousand human beings on board.

Films of this class add prestige and dignity to the moving picture industry and will undoubtedly call forth the unstinted praise of the agitators for educational films. We congratulate the Yankee Film Company on their "scoop" and hope they will continue the good work. This picture will be entitled "The Giant of the Ocean," and will be released Friday, July 1st.

A HANDY TOOL FOR OPERATORS.



Mr. Lavezzi, of the Lavezzi Machine Works, this city, announces that he has just turned out a valuable tool that has been designated for removing taper pins from stars, cams and sprockets, and will be found especially useful for sprockets. By its use pins can be removed and put in place without danger of bending the shaft out of true alignment. The outfit is com posed of a block and a set of nicely tempered punches. Readers will find Mr. Lavezzi's advertisement elsewhere in this issue.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

NO ROOM FOR MEDIOCRITY.

Lawrence, Kan., June 4, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir.—Perhaps after an oppressive quiet of some months or more, you would not mind hearing some sentiments on moving pictures, which the gentle Kansas zephyrs waft about every now and then. I would not vouch, however, for opinions on this subject which emanate from the region of Manhattan, from whence, as you will recall, certain portentous explosions were sent out with blast-like fury some months ago, which explosions, if my memory does not fail me, originated in the fertile brain of a professor of philosophy. Fortunately, Kansas is able to produce more than one set of opinions and has at least one professor of philosophy who has faith in and positive knowledge of the intrinsic value of motion photography. This I know, for he is at the head of the very department in which I have studied here. So much for Kansas.

You know, I believe that Western Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska and other territory in this region are big enough to be occasionally written up in the Moving Picture World, along the line of pictures of course. Unless I am mistaken, there is a notable absence of news from this part of the country, and I hope I am not too critical in asking to see some once in a while. We out here think we have just as good real picture theaters as there are anywhere else in the country, so far as quality, and not gaudy display, goes.

The poet Horace once wrote that mediocrity will be tolerated in certain other branches of art, but that neither the gods, men, nor the book shops, would stand for that quality in poets. I am inclined to think that were Horace with us in this our enlightened age, he would make that little law cover at least one or two more branches of the fine arts. Perhaps that term "fine arts" is unfamiliarily mentioned in speaking of the subject of moving pictures. But when you come to think about it, the motion picture is entitled to just as big a place in the realm of fine arts as is dramatic art, and I might even venture to add music. So, I believe that we all concede that Horace would include the picture in his maxim, were he alive and able to appreciate the aesthetic qualilties of the art.

As in most everything else nowadays, mediocrity comes from just two sources, namely: ignorance and greed. While this statement is a platitude and a little harsh sounding, it's none the less true. I presume that some picture producers, wearied by the cries of their critics and pressed with the omnipotent business of money-getting, have long ceased to burden their fagged brains with ideas on quality betterment—entertaining the erroneous idea that they have progressed as far as the good Lord is going to allow them, and that they will be the ultimate loosers if they don't hurry up and get that four hundred dollar "production" ready for release next week, instead of stopping to take a breath long enough to fire that "irreproachable" scenario editor, secure a more efficient producing manager and attempt to lay hold of a camera man who has at least some element of artistic sense in the manipulation of the most difficult of all instruments, the camera.

Mediocrity there is in this picture business; the statement and the fact are both old. Gross neglect there is also and last, but not least, a pitiful misinterpretation of the public's wants. Why, oh, why will the producers continue in the very face of sound, common sense advice to waste—yes, literally throw away perfectly good film and time in the productions of pointless, meaningless, senseless, irrational, asinine, non-elevating and certainly unamusing "comedies" and cowboy tortures? "The public wants them," is the curt, phonographic reply we get for our answer. So long as this state of things exists, we have an atmosphere of vaudeville and cheap thespianism enveloping the moving picture, we who long to see it on a plane with the best of the other fine arts.

While these evils and the remedies thereof have been oft pointd out in the pages of your estimable paper, yet we out here in Kansas who are lovers of the picture feel that our chirp will not be without weight in the general consensus of opinions on picture matters which are bound, sooner or later, to sweep the manufacturers off their feet and hold them off till they land right side up on the question of quality betterment.

To my mind there are just two, and only two, paths for the motion picture to take; it will either brace up on quality and price, catering to thinking people and the better element of the country, or it will retrograde or else remain stationary, sticking to the five and ten cent notion and ultimately wearing itself out by its own sheer inability to cope with the fickle and unfathomable whims of the five and ten cent class of the amusement public.

Now these sentiments may seem pessimistic and ill-advised, but I assure you they are not. Nor do I infer that there are no good motion pictures being put out, for there are, just lots of them—fine ones—elevating and thoroughly wholesome, but—there are some bad ones, too. Not only do we have to put up with mediocrity in films, but with absolutely stale and no-excuse-for-living stuff. What with harsh criticism, the almost Utopian producer whose worst virtues will be a willing ear and ready acquiescence and with the pressing demands of an enlightened public, we may some day hope for an open market which may possibly reduce mediocrity to a nonentity.

Out here at Kansas University we had a man (Pittsburg University has him now) who was a pioneer in the field of industrial fellowships in universities, at least for the West. Manufacturers of all kinds and descriptions subsequent to his early endeavors, established at various rates of expense fellowships here and at other institutions for the purpose of bettering their various products and discovering new methods. Now to come to the point, I have never heard so far of a fellowship maintained for the benefit and betterment of the motion picture. Obviously, were there to be such an innovation, the manufacturer would be the fellow to start the ball, and maintain it, for that matter. What would be the advantages and immunities in such a step for him? Undoubtedly there is room for improvement in certain portions of the manufacture and production of the motion picture, not to speak of discoveries that might be made in the line of machinery, developing or color processes or even in camera work. Here is a big question and for one I would like mightily to see someone take enough interest to look into the merits or demerits, as the case might prove. Not only would a manufacturer of the picture or its products be benefited by more or less affiliation with educational institutions, but he might possibly learn something for the good of the trade and incidentally himself. But possibly something of this nature has already been taken up with.

I want to express my appreciation and approval of Messrs. Craw and Claudy's views which have been expressed in your journal the past several months. I think that if some of the producers would take the subject matter of the World for what it is worth and not forget its contents one minute after having read them, there would be the much needed improvements spoken of above. However, more anon.

Sincerely yours,

NELSON T. STEPHENS.

FROM A PROGRESSIVE EXHIBITOR.

Enclosing a clipping from a newspaper, which tells how a boy through steady attendance at a circus and Indian shows was lured away from the quiet life of the East, as typified in Syracuse and finally struck the trail for the Far West, a Syracuse exhibitor sends the following interesting letter to the Moving Picture World:

Syracuse, N. Y., June 3, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir.—I am inclosing a clipping, from Syracuse Post-Standard, of even date, showing that that old inborn love of excitement in full-blooded youngsters prompts many a youth to hie for the Woolly West via circus and Wild West trains. It is noticeable that moving pictures were not to blame for this little lad's escapade—credit is given for once where it belongs. What a glorious opportunity to knock the moving picture industry—alas, poor thoughtless reporter.

I might say that here in Syracuse the moving picture exhibitors, while not organized, are extremely friendly and have, principally through a kindred interest in general advancement, kept strictly away from disastrous cut-throat methods occasionally mentioned in your publication as predominating in some sections.

We have an enthusiastic people, all of whom appreciate the good efforts being put forth to entertain them. Our Sunday exhibitions, throughout the city, are immensely popular. Every house, Licensed and Independent both, puts up exceptionally interesting Sunday bills, with a general leaning towards sacred and educational pictures. Our patrons like it and permit me to state that our Sunday exhibitions are regularly attended by liberal-minded church people of all denominations. In my opinion a more liberal Sunday law will eventually become general throughout the State. I have noted frequent references in your paper along lines of ventilation. In our own theater we have a system that changes 400,000 cubic feet of air four times every hour. We style our hall "The Sanitary Moving Picture Theater" and "play" the fresh air song early and often. Results are decidedly excellent. People who formerly feared germ-laden atmosphere and disgusting odors are coming stronger every day. As I am writing this to-night we have a string of autos in front of our hall, the owners and guests all enjoying the best we can give them in motion photography.

I would like to see more "booster" articles in your magazine. Why not a department for the interchange of ideas and methods on "boosting business?" I might state that in our hall we do considerable of our own boosting on our screen and by announcements. We are situated in a "neighborhood" largely German. The residents are generally an intelligent class and meet all our announcements of bettering conditions, service and such with liberal applause. It shows they appreciate our efforts to give them good, clean, wholesome, "sanitary" pictures.

Sincerely yours,
J. J. MURPHY,
Mgr. Turn Hall M. P. Theater.

CORRESPONDENCE

Los Angeles.

Hygiene Educational Films.—Dr. William Evans, an official of the American Medical Association, at present holding a convention in Los Angeles, has secured the Arrow Theater, in the Hamburger Building, for the afternoon of June 28th, where a series of health films will be shown free to all, accompanied by an explanatory lecture by the doctor. These films will include two "fly films," showing the danger from these bothersome insects and how they may be exterminated; a pure milk lesson film, entitled: "The Man Who Learned," depicting the difference in sanitary conditions between clean and unclean dairies; a tuberculosis film, and one on tenement house conditions. Another film of great importance, will depict the Child Welfare Exhibition, held recently in Chicago. Stereopticon pictures will also be used, and additional moving pictures showing the children in folk dances, at play, and at work. Dr. Evans declares that the great difficulty inpuhlic health-education is that the information does not reach those that need it most. It is hoped that the moving pictures, by their universal appeal, will remedy this condition. Dr. Evans is planning a subtle way ia which to drive the needed facts home to those ia need of them. Unannounced, and unmarked by any health sign, a single educational film is to he slipped into various picture shows daily, not only during the convention week of the association, hut thereafter. This method will aiso be adopted in other cities as a means of spreading konwledge without creating opposltion.

Pictures Kill Skating Rink.—The Pomona, Cal., skating rink has closed its doors. The old rink was operated by Earnest Richter for the past six years. He says that moving pictures are responsihle for the closing of the riuk.

Object to Moving Picture Ordinance.—The Southern California Motion Picture Men's Association turned out ia force last week at the hearing of the new censorship ordinance, and through their attorney registered strenuous objection to certain features of the ordinance, saying that were it striagently enforced, as it ln all probability would be, it would put half of the city's theaters out of business. The exhibitors claim that they are already so hedged with restrictions as to the age limit of children permitted to enter the theaters, standing in the aisles, theater exit lights, and a hundred and one other minor provisions, that it is almost impossible to keep from technically violating the ordinances frequently. They feared that the commission might make arbitrary and prejudiclal rulings and revoke or suspend permits and licenses for technical or unavoidahle violations* of the ordinance. They urged that the clause providing fines for violation of the ordinance would be a sufficient deterrent to prevent proprietors from wilfully disobeying the ordinaace. After hearing lengthy arguments from hoth sides, the legislation committee of the city council announced that they would take the matter uader advisemeat for oae week.

Moving Picture Cars on Railroad Trains.—The southern Pacific Railroad Company announce that they are planning to provide speciaiiy huilt and equipped "theater" cars on west bound California trains, through the medium of which west bound travelers will he regaled with the wonders and resources of Southern California, through the medium of the moving pictures. For some time past officials of the company have been considering the feasibllity of installing the moviag picture oa many of the trains hound for California. It was decided recently that the plan, which will entail a tremendous expense, he pushed to a speedy realization hy the company. The company will build and equip a number of cars to accommodate from 40 to 50 passengers at a time, ln which moving pictures will be exhibited. These amusement cars will be attached to the big through express trains at some Middle Western city, probably Kansas City, and notices of a continuous performance will be posted in each car of such trains. Coupetent operators and lecturers will accompany the cars. The exhihition will consist of scenic, industrial, and other pictures of life ln California, particularly Southern California, showing all the famous beauty spots of the State, as well as a series of instructive films, teaching prospective settiers and residents some of the details of the main industries and home life of the State. The company for some time has maintained a staff of advertising men in their department of advertising the State, and among the staff are operators, lecturers and a good supply of moving picture film of California life. It was decided, however, that an actual display of films on the maiu westbound trains would appeal to a class of people who would derive actual monetary benefit from the innovation. With this object in view, officials of the railroad obtained the services of Prof. W. S. Irwin, who is now on his way to this city. While the company is busy constructiag the new cars, Prof. Irwin will look after the mechanicai details of the proposed exhibitlon. It has heen found by experiment, that several important changes will have to be made in order that the pictures can be shown successfully on board moving trains. Many of the films to be used in the exhibitions have already been taken. Southern California and Los Angeles will be much in the foreground by reason of the big number of films being turned out in Los Angeles weekly by the ten producers working here. Some of the pictures shown will he: Life at the Venice, Long Beach, Ocean Park, and other seaside resorts; San Pedro, and the city harbor; Catalina Island, with its beautiful marine attractions; Pasadena, and its Rose Tournament; street and park scenes in Los Angeles; films showing Yosemite Valley; Mariposa big trees; Santa Barbara; Lake Tahoe, many of the films taken from front ends of trains and automobiles en tour. Officials of the company are enthusiastic over the plan and promise its early operation, a large appropriation having been recently set aside for the project.

Avalon to have M. P. Theater.—Avalon, Catalina Island, off the mainland of Los Angeles County, and known all over the world as one of the State's most famous resorts, is soon to have its first theater, a combination vaudeville and moving picture show. The theater is being built by Watson D. Hubbard, of Los Angeles, and by July 1st it is expected to be open for the entertainment of the island's residents and visitors.

New Exchange for Los Angeles.—A aew film exchange will be established at 749 S. Broadway, under the management of M. H. Newman and Eddie Woods. They will make a specialty of special releases, educational, and scenic films, which will be supplied with appropriate lectures if desired. The company have estahlished offices and workrooms at the above address, and will be ready for business by the time this article appears in print.

Pastime Theater, Long Beach.—Mr. Edward Woods, formerly the proprietor of the Pastime Theater, has sold the theater to Mr. Toothaker, a Long Beach man.

D. S. Marcowitz, manager of the local branch of the California Film Exchange, has returned from a three-days' business trip to San Francisco, where he succeeded in making arrangements to get more first-run service for the local branch. As a result of the trip, aew bookiag traasfers may be looked for.

Fred C. Dawes, manager for the local branch of Miles Brothers Film Exchange, haa gone to San Francisco on a hrief business trip la the interest of the business of the local exchange. He expects to be back ia the city within four days.

New England

Newport, R. I.—The chances are that photographers will no longer be afraid to take pictures of the "sights" ia and about Newport. Formerly photographers (of still and aalmated pictures) have had many rows and disturhances while attempting to photograph Newport's attractions. Many cameras have been smashed by irate property owners. The decision of Judge Stearns of the Supreme Court has decided that photographers may take pictures at will on the public highways.

S. Z. Poli, the well-known theatrical manager, has given out the contracts for the construction of the New Bijou Dream, New Haven, Conn. This house will take the place of Mr. Poli's old Bijou Dream, which was destroyed by fire this spring. The new house will surpass the old oae in every way, and will be one of the most up-to-date theaters devoted to "pop" vaudeville and pictures in this section. It is to have a depth of 136 feet, and a frontage of 92 feet and to have but one balcony. The seating capacity will be about 1,800.

Mr. Frank Morgan, maaager of the Music Hall, Milford, Mass., finds his summer business kolding up very well over this hot weather, and expects to remain open throughout the entire summer. Pictures and songs are offered.

Norfolk Hall, Dorchester, Mass., was recently closed, because of poor business. The fixtures and machines were sold at auction. The manager of this unfortunate moving picture house was Mr. William Frank, better knowu to the New England trade as "Finan Haddie's Father."

Mr. J. F. Cooney, who is operating the World-In-Motion Theater, Pittsfield, Mass., is having a fine rua of trade, and is about to open a new photoplay theater at Housatonic, Mass.

Mr. E. H. Gerstle, who has managed the Congress Theater, Portland, Maine, for the past season, has resigned his position at that house, and will soon affiliate himself with the "Scenic Temple" Circuit, operated by Willlam Bradstreet, of Bostoa. Mr. Gerstle is one who is thoroughly experienced in this line of business, and should prove a valuahle acquisition to the Scenic Circuit. Mr. Bradstreet runs an unusually large circuit of "Scenic Temples," which run throughout the eutire leagth of New England.

Bernard Hennessy, of Fitchhurg, Mass., was chosen to represent the local 86. I. A. T. S. E. at the national convention, to be held at Niagara Falls, this month.

The Bijou Theater, Bangor, Maine, has closed for alteratioas, and will re-open late in August, with an enlarged seating capacity ,and with many repairs and improvements. The Bijou haa closed a prosperous season.

Mr. Moe Mark, the genial proprietor of the Theater Comique, Lynn, Mass., is back at his house, after a trip to the West on business. Manager Mark is certainly catching a very good-sized proportion of the picture trade in his city, with the vaudeville taken out of his hills. Pictures and songs are filling Mr. Mark's Comique.

The Lyric Garden Theater, Bridgeport, Conn., opened to the public June 26, and had a good trade. The house intends to run "pop" vaudeville and pictures, with a change of bill bi-weekly. The Lyric Garden is managed by Mr. W. H. Isham, a well-known theatrical manager, who should make the house a success, as Bridgeport is held to be a good town for moving pictures.

Manager H. L. Strong, of the Dreamland Theater, Keene, N. H., intends to remain open this summer, as he is finding business quite satisfactory. No vaudeville is used by Manager Strong.

These columns of last week made detailed mention of the benefit performances at the Dreamland Theater, Beverly, Mass., given for the widow and six children of policeman D. F. McLean, who was killed hy electricity while attempting to repair an electric light on one of Beverly's streets. Messrs. Ware Brothers, the proprietors of the Dreamland, reported to the writer that it was just $1,796 that they handed over to Mrs. McLean.

Mr. T. R. Bullock, proprietor and resident manager of "Bullock's," Providence, R. I., closed his popular "pop" vaudeville and picture house oa Saturday, July 1. After making some needed repairs and improvements Mr. Bullock will re-open his theater during the last week in August.

This writer in a former issue published a copy of the new building laws, as regards theaters in Providence, R. I. As a direct result of the passage of these new building laws hy the legislature, a preliminary injuaction from the Superior Court was granted against the new theater now in the process of erection by the Allen Theater aad Realty Company. This will probably go iato the courts, as a sort of test case. After this case is determined, prospective theater builders in Rhode Islaad will be able to ascertain just what the new laws really mean.

Taunton, Mass., will have a practically new theater early in September, as the old Music Hall is heiag thoroughly refitted, enlarged, and generally changed in appearance. Manager White will be at the head of the Music Hall when it is ready for its new opening.

The Scenic Theater, Westhrook, Maine, is doing just as hig a business as hefore, even if the vaudeville has been eliminated. Plenty of pictures are being shown to good houses.

Mr. J. J. Cahill, of the well-known firm of McCue and Cahill, operating a score of moving picture and vaudeville houses in New England, is now visiting his old home in the West. His partner, Mr. McCue, is now to be seen at the Geaeral Film Company's Bostoa office twice each week, picking out the pictures for his several houses. Usually Mr. McCue attends to the vaudeville end of the business, while Mr. Cahill picks the picture programs.

Hathaway's Theater, New Bedford, Mass., is to close, in order that some much needed alteratioas may be made. The house will re-open in August.

The Berkshire Park Theater, Pittsfield, Mass., has closed, owing to bad business. Edward Silverstein, who was in charge of the Park Theater, has gone away—no one knows just where. Accordingly the theater's affairs are in bad shape. Just prior to the closing, a stock company held the boards at the house, so the poor business caanot be laid to the door of motography.

Louisville.

Manager Joseph Steurle, of the Broadway Amusement Company, operating the Broadway and West Broadway houses, as well as the Ideal and Baxter airdomes, says that general trade conditions have been perceptihly toned down during the heated term. Mr. Steurle is well satisfied with the seasonable volume, however, and reports a special feature introduced at the Broadway chain of theaters with excellent results. Ita, a seventeen-year-old girl mentalist, has beea booked by the Broadway management for a long run at their theaters. She does a mind-reading act that is pronounced second to none and has been making a hig hit at the Broadway and West Broadway. The mentalist will play the airdomes of the Broadway company aext week and has the privilege of a return engagement, covering a month or more additional, if she so desires. Mr. Steurle is a firm adherent of the tenet relative to not letting a good thing slip hy, and the girl mentalist has certainly proved to he a husiness producer.

L. J. Dittmar reports good business at the houses of the Royal Amusement Compaay during the hot spell. The Majestic on Fourth Avenue is playing to especially good houses, Western films having the popular call.

The preference that has hitherto been outlined in this section of the country for interesting reels from the "wild and woolly West" is becoming more pronounced, especially in Louisville. These films are never of a "blood and thunder" nature, but are intelligently contrived and educational to a great degree. For some reason the Southern picture-loving public has an affinity for Western delineations. The offerings of the Royal Amusement Company, at the Royal, Eighteenth Street and Broadway, and the Majestic, Fourth Avenue and Chestnut Street, invariably contain a reel of cowboy or Indian pictures. Glancing at the programs of the Princess Amusement Company houses in the downtown district, the Orpheum, the Casino and the Columbia, one sees that quite an array of pictures of the favored type are included, and the authority of these well-known show companies is too strong to be overlooked when the question of catering to popular taste is reached. The Princess offerings last week, which are reported to have brought very satisfactory business even during the scorching period, included the following: The Casino—Fighting Blood (American Biograph), the Hidden Mine (Essanay). Orpheum—Old Indian Days (Pathe Freres), Rescued in Time (Lubin).

The Columbia Theater, on Fourth Avenue near Market Street, operated by the Princess Amusement Company, is being renovated and redecorated throughout. The policy of management at this house has been changed also. Independent first-run films are being shown with a daily change of program in an effort to place the Columbia as the premier five-cent theater of the downtown section. The move is pronounced to have been very satisfactory.

It was announced a short time ago that one of the most valuable pieces of down-town property in Louisville had beeu leased to the Derr Brothers, of Indianapolis, Ind., who will erect a handsome moving picture theater ou the site. The property is located on West Market Street near Fourth Avenue and is in the heart of a fine field for an up-to-date show. The Indianapolis firm luckily secured a ten-year lease on the local site, the contract providing for an annual rental of $4,500. Work will be commenced at once upon the building.

The People's Theater, on Main Street in Corbin, Ky., which has been closed for several weeks past, reopened last week under new management. Joseph Meicain, of Cincinnati, Ohio, has been secured by the People's Theatrical Circuit Company, which bandles a chain of picture shows through that section of the State, to manage the Corbin establishment and extensive improvements and enlargements are now being made.

L. C. Sugg is reported to be erecting a handsome picture show of the most modern type on the coruer of Green and Eustis Streets in Huntsville, Ala.

Work is to be started on two new moving picture theaters in Louisville, which have been incorporated under the names of the New Hippodrome Company, with $15,000 capital stock, and the Olympic Theater Company, which has $7,500 capital stock. Jacob and Nathan Solinger are the principal stockholders of the companies.

The films showing the Decoration Day races on the Speedway at Indianapolis have been leaders with local houses, the Majestic showing one reel, while the Princess Amusement Company put on the pictures at the Casino and Hopkins Theater. Large crowds attended the performances at all three places, showing that automobile races are sufficiently thrilling to please the most blasé.

"Pictures which have 'news interest,'" said a leading moving picture operator of Louisville, "are the strongest cards we can possibly put ou. Dramas are good, and comedies are excellent, but to bring out the crowds, give me the pictures which show the things that people have read about in the papers and have probably wished to see in person. The Kentucky Derby, for instance, was shown at one of the local houses recently, and in spite of the fact that many thousands of people went to the track to see the race, interest in the reproduction was keen, and big houses were the rule. Among the pictures I can recall which have made big hits were the Olympic games in London and the aeroplane exhibitions of the Wrights and others, while I hope that we shall get to show the scenes attending the coronation of George V."

Another moving picture company has entered the local field. It is the Falls Cities Amusement Company, which has been formed with a capital stock of $20,000. Moses Levinson, of Shelbyville, Ind., David Levinson, Caroline Levinson and Michael Switow, of Jeffersonville, Ind., are the incorporators. Mr. Switow has already planned several houses, and it is understood that the new company will operate theaters in Jeffersonville and New Albany, Ind., across the river from Louisville, in addition to the Louisville house.

A new moving picture house is to be opened by J. P. Masters, of Memphis, Tenn. He has leased the Columbia Theater at Bowling Green, and will have it in operation in the next week. He is well known in the moving picture field.

The Consolidation Coal Company is a corporation with several million dollars capital stock. It owns 100,000 acres of timber and coal land in Eastern Kentucky, comprising sites in Letcher, Harlan and other counties. It will require several thousand men in its work, and for the purpose of housing them it is building a new town to be called Jenkins. It is in Letcher County. Contracts have been let for the erection of 1,000 buildings, including dwellings, churches and schools. A noteworthy feature of the town-building plan is that a theater will also be built, and this, it is stated, will be used for moving picture shows, as well as occasional dramatic entertainments. The recognition by members of the company of the need for legitimate amusement has been shown by their conclusion to put up a building, and it is likely that it will be leased to some practical moving picture man for operating purposes. Work on the construction of the town has already been begun.

Cool weatber, accompanied by rain, has been the rule in Kentucky during the past week, and the moving picture theaters have increased their business as a result, as the open air was sought by many during the extremely hot weather. The moving picture theaters were pronounced the coolest spots in town, at that, as all of them are equipped witb a battery of powerful fans which keep the air in circulation. The ventilating systems of the theaters as a rule are excellent, so that comfortable conditions prevail.

G. D. CRAIN, JR.

Washington, D. C.

The presentation of the coronation ceremonies at the various theaters here offered something of an amusement to the observer, although to the managers i was real, serious business, no doubt. The fact that the Mauretania was the first steamer leaving England after these films were ready for the market and the one making the quickest voyage, it was naturally called into service to bring over these films along with other express material, haggage and passengers. But from the way this steamer has been dragged on the posters of various picture houses, one might suppose that the chief business of the Mauretania was to fly for its life over the ocean waves with so precious a burden as the coronation films of both the Association and Independent manufacturers.

As if this were not exciting enough and to give it an official flavor, Manager Brylawski secured special privilege for his reel from the Pathe Company to be conveyed by the revenue cutter to the docks, thus gaining time of custom inspection and other delays. This was because Mr. Brylawski had arranged for a private showing of this reel to the diplomats and officials, to which President Taft was invited, before the film should see the light in a public house. Still this was not going to prevent the other managers from enjoying the same privilege if possible. Anyway, they were going to get the coronation reel to Washington by the shortest time possible. Two houses announced the film for June 30, but of course it could not arrive in time for the opening of the show at noon. Accordingly, one house advertised the appearance of this much-looked-for event at 8 o'clock in the evening, while his rival went one better by stating that his reel would come on the screen at 7:30 p. m. When sifted down, it amounted to which messenger should arrive at the theater first. Really, if an airship could have been brought into service, it would have been used to bring the coronation picture to Washington. The result that the coronation ceremonies appeared at the Empress at 1:18 p. m., while the Virginia made a close second in the displaying of this same event.

Mr. Brylawski went at the matter more calmly. Having given the official exhibitiou of the reel, he announced the appearance of the coronation reels at the Colonial for a week. This theater, which is a pioneer in the moving picture business, has become knowu for the presentation of reels of big historical and national events, where appropriate orchestral music is always heard. The musical setting of the coronation film was the subject of much favorable comment. Manager Brylawski had the distinction of showing the first Pathe Freres coronation reel in Washington.

The Virginia, hy special effort, secured a first-release reel of the coronation ceremonies on June 30 and the reel remained here for several days receiving excellent patronage.

The five-cent houses were not the only ones to make the observer believe that Washington had gone "coronation-mad."" The Columbia Theater exhibited this reel with prices as high as fifty cents, and secured a crowded house on Sunday night. Of course it was showing other reels as well, chiefly of a travel nature. Still, the coronation was the feature that brought most of the people there.

The Auditorium, which offers a ten-cent show, adding some songs of good quality for a relaxation, was ahle to fill its large hall during its several evening shows with the coronation pictures after the reel had been runuing at several other houses a few days previous.

Manager Crandell, of LaGrand, found that the showing of the coronation films for two nights did not lessen his attendance, but, if possible, added to it.

There are a lot of people in Washington who patronize the moving picture shows and when something of world-fame comes, there are a lot more people who visit these theaters for that particular event. This is what has happened with the coronation reel with all its gorgeous pageant. "It's just as good as being there," said one enthusiast. "And think what a lot of money we've saved," was the reply. "I'm glad I waited for the pictures," came from one who could not have afforded to visit New York, much less England. "I tell you what," was a studied remark, "the moving pictures are the thing. You can just stay at home and see everything." "I've seen the coronation twice and enjoyed it both times. It's grand!"

An appropriate film was displayed at The Leader on July Fourth in the form of the slides of the various events relative to the Declaration of Independence. In order to make this more progressive and educational, Manager Miller secured the services of Mr. Harding, of the Columbia Players, who gave a short talk for each picture. This was something that pleased mightily the patrons of The Leader. It was quite in keeping with the "safe and sane" Fourth of July now in operation in the Capital City

Faust has been making the rounds in Washington but an opera so well known as this would be spoiled if not given the proper musical setting. With this in mind the Niagara, under Manager Joy, offered about as fine a presentation of Faust as one could expect of a photoplay. Mr. Joy is a musician and a singer himself and he was well prepared. The same praise must be given to the way the Miller Bros., of The Leader, offered this reel to their patrons. "It's even better than the opera," declared a Leader enthusiast. "It is certainly more natural in its scenic effects, while the music is as effective as at big theaters."

It is not often that a photoplay and a real drama make their initial bow to the public at the same time in the same city. This, however, is what has just happened with Lorna Doone in Washington. Willard Holcomb's dramatization of the Blackmore novel was appearing at the Belasco Theater, while the motion picture houses were showing the same play. It was a case of real and reel dramas.

In the Mississippi Valley.

Robert Stetson will open a moving picture show in the Patton building at Lincoln, Ill., giving three performances a week. Vaudeville will be an added feature.

Moving picture shows in Beardstown, Ill., will be charged a license fee of $5 for each three months.

The Progressive Amusement Company, of Chicago, has been incorporated, with capital stock of $5,000, to do a general amusement business. The incorporators are, Jacob M. Black, Julius Johnson and John A. Verhoeven.

R. F. Lawrence, of Peoria, Ill., has opened the Majestic Theater at Chillicothe, Ill., which gives moving pictures and two acts of vaudeville.

The Colonial Theater, at Bloomington, Ill., was especially decorated the week of the Manufacturers' and Merchants' Carnival. Not only that, but the manager, William A. Peterson, acted as drum major, ahead of the DeMolay band, leading the principal parades of the week.

Chrisman, Ill., is to have a novel theater—that is, when it is a theater. In the summer it will flow along as a swimming pool, but in the winter, the water will be drained out and it will serve as an amusement house. Fred K. Thayer is said to be financing the enterprise.

A new front has been built at Martin's Airdome, at Red Bud, Ill. This place features pictures.

James Chase, who has been singer at the Main Street Theater, Bloomington, Ill., for the last fourteen months, has accepted a similar position at Hannibal, Mo.

Aurora, Ill., has passed an ordinance requiring a license fee of $50 a year from moving picture shows, where not more than ten cents is charged.

The Pastime Amusement Company of Chicago, has been incorporated, with capital stock of $5,000, to conduct theaters and other places of amusement. The incorporators are, John J. Erickson, G. Bernhardt, E. Anderson and Carolina Erickson.

Decatur, Ill., will not have Sunday moving picture shows and sacred concerts because of opposition hy the public. Press dispatches say that the showmen had secured hundreds of signatures to petitions, but when the opposition became so pronounced, tore the lists into pieces.

A new theater—the Star—has been opened in the Patton building, at Atlanta, Ill. Moving pictures will be a feature in addition to vaudeville. Three shows each week will be given, Thursday, Friday and Saturday nights.

The Willard Theater Company, of Chicago, has been incorporated, with capital stock of $40,000, to do a general theatrical and mercantile business. The incorporators are Fred D. Silber, Frank Babley and Clarence J. Silber.

The old Columbia Airdome, in Granite City, Ill., has been dismantled, the "For Rent" sign hanging there in vain.

Miss Gertrude Lake, 25 years old, of Janesville, Wis., who for two years was pianist at the Grand Theater, in Elgin, Ill., died June 23, at Elgin.

The Gateley Amusement Company, of Springfield, Ill., has been incorporated, with capital stock of $2,500, to do a general theatrical business. This company is now operating an airdome at Sixth Street and Capitol Avenue. The incorporators are, John P. Gately, Eugene H. Angert aad Fred L. English.

Chicago parties, it is reported, will open a costly photoplay house on Galena Street, Freeport, Ill.

The Rogers Park Theater Company, of Chicago, has been granted a state charter. It is authorized to do business, with capital stock of $5,000. The incorporators are, Condit Voorhees, John H. O'Connor and Ingvall N. Herreid.

THE BADGE OF COURAGE.—Little Tom, who has inherited a terror for the sea, faints when his father tries to take him into the surf. Fifteen years later Tom finds that time has not overcome his terror. Meeting Jane Mayfield, they become acquainted and afterward betrothed. A few days later, Tom, much against his will, allows Jane to persuade him to join her merry party to the sea shore. While in bathing, Jane is carried out to sea by the undertow. At her cry for help Tom rushes to the water's edge, but his old terror renders him helpless. A number of bathers quickly go to the rescue of Jane. When brought ashore and revived she calls Tom a coward and orders him from her presence. A few days later Tom calls at her home to offer an explanation, but not finding her there, he asks permission to write her a note. While writing the telephone rings. He learns that Jane is at the other end of the telephone at her father's office, locked in and that the building is on fire. Mounting his motorcycle he rushes to the building, breaks in the door, and at the risk of his life carries her through the flames and to safety. The next day, calling at Jane's home, explanations take place and the past is forgotten.

MAKING MOTHER OVER.—Bertie, while on a visit to the old farm in the country suggests to mother that she come to the city and get fixed up swell like Widow Brown. Mother finally consents and father goes down to the station to see them all off. Bertie and his sister Marjorie plan a rejuvenation of mother. Mother gets her wrinkles removed and Marjorie takes her to a physical culturist to have her figure developed. Mother receives a letter from father which brings consternation into camp. The letter reads, "Dear Wife: Your sister had to go home. The Widow Brown will keep house until you return. Yours, Hiram." Mother's wardrobe arriving, she starts back home. The father not recognizing her in her new getup, drives off saying, "My wife is no such fandangled critter." Mother, heart-broken, returns to the city insisting that they get her old clothes. The maid who has thrown the cast off clothing in the ash barrel, rushes out and overtakes the rag picker, giving him five dollars to return the clothing he has taken from the ash can. The next day mother receives another letter from father, reading, "Dear Wife: Will come for you to-day. Be ready to go home." By the time father arrives, mother is again arrayed in her old clothes and she registers a vow, "Never again, plain clothes for me."

LUBIN.

GOOD FOR EVIL (July 15).—George and Bill were pals on a Western ranch, and both were deeply in love with Dorothy. Dorothy, in reality, loved George best. One day, word came that George's mother was dying in the East, and he started for home, but not before he had placed an engagement ring on Dorothy's finger. After he reached home, his mother died, and a few days later, George himself fell sick with a fever. He rapidly grew worse, and finally the doctors told him that he could not recover. He then dictated a letter to Dorothy and one to Bill, telling each of his sickness. Bill got the two letters. He read his own, and then, being madly in love with Dorothy, he destroyed the other, and told her that George had forgotten her. Believing this, Dorothy consented to become Bill's wife.

But George did not die. After several months, he recovered. He decided to surprise Dorothy, and set out for the West. But alas! for the surprise which he had in mind. It was George himself who was surprised, for he arrived just after Dorothy and Bill had been married. Dorothy's father met him and told him that the kindest thing he could do would be to get away without letting Dorothy know of his recovery. In utter wretchedness, George acquiesced and walked away, out into the desert. Then Dorothy's father called Bill aside and upbraided him for his deception. Dorothy overheard the conversation. She told Bill that she could never love a man who was guilty of duplicity. She commanded him to try to find George.

Bill, overcome with remorse, started out to find his former rival. He discovered him almost dead from thirst. At first, George repulsed him, but finally they clasped hands. Bill insisted that George drink all the water. Then they attempted to struggle back to the ranch. On the way, Bill was overcome, sank to the earth and finally died. George was also near death, but was discovered later by a searching party, just in time to save his life.

Dorothy, being freed by the death of Bill, became the bride of George.

ALICE'S SACRIFICE (July 17).—Alice Moore and Allan Dean had been sweethearts from childhood. Allan had high ambitions to become a playwright. In all his early struggles, Alice was his comforter, advisor and steadfast friend. Finally word came from New York that he should visit the metropolis and call upon Charles Bran, well known manager and producer.

It happened, however, that on further consideration, the great manager and producer found Allan's play did not quite come up to the standard. Not to be discouraged, Allan returned to his hotel, determined to remedy the defects in his play. He also wrote to Alice that the outlook was encouraging.

When this letter arrived at home, Alice's younger sister, Grace, who had always wanted to become an actress, prevailed upon Alice to allow her to go to New York, and to New York she came, surprising Allan in the midst of his work. Grace pleaded to be allowed to try the leading part in the re-written play. She studied the lines, and Allan was surprised and amazed at the ability which she displayed. In due time, the revised play was accepted. Grace was introduced to the manager, and was given a try-out. On the opening night, she won success and fame for the play and for herself.

Alice at home in a little town, waited in vain for news of her sweetheart and sister. Gradually she learned the truth. A little later, having won success and wealth, Allan decided to pay a visit to his old home, accompanied by Grace. The noble-hearted Alice, realizing that she was forgotten, and that her sister and her former sweetheart were entirely wrapped up in each other, determined to dress in the plainest possible manner, so as not to disturb in the least, the love of these two.

A GAY TIME IN ATLANTIC CITY (July 20).—The call of summer was in the blood of Fred Perkins and George Smith. They longed to disport themselves upon the sands and in the waves by the seaside. But, alas! they were married. Fearful handicap! Still being brave and also clever, they proceeded to overcome this disadvantage.

Fred suddenly had a nervous breakdown, shaking all over most fearfully in the presence of his wife. Just at the right time, George brought around a doctor, who was something of a sport himself. Doc looked serious. He must go away for a couple of weeks to the mountains, said Doc. Friend George nobly presented himself to be his caretaker, waving aside all considerations of neglect to his business or other inconvenience. Noble man! In due time, the invalid and his friend, roughly dressed and carrying kettles, pans and other camping paraphernalia, said good-bye to their wives. Then they hit the high places for a thick wood, not far distant where they had hidden two suitcases full of clothes. After dressing in their gay garments—Fred had entirely recovered from his nervous breakdown—they took the fastest train for gay Atlantic City.

There they met a couple of young ladies, with whom they rode along the boardwalk in rolling chairs, and later went in bathing.

Meanwhile, Mrs. Perkins and Mrs. Smith, being lonely, decided to spend a couple of days in Atlantic City. Thither they went in Mrs. Smith's motor car. Their room in the hotel overlooked the beach, and there after talking for a while and wondering how their husbands were getting along in the lonely mountains, far from civilization's comfort, they sighed and looked out over the beach, where a great crowd of bathers were enjoying themselves. They looked through field-glasses. Suddenly, Mrs. Perkins ejaculated "Oh!" She handed the glasses to Mrs. Smith. Mrs. Smith looked and she also ejaculated "Oh!" for they had recognized their husbands with the two girls in the surf, and they certainly did not look as though they were ill.

It did not take Mrs. Perkins and Mrs. Smith very long to get to the beach. Their husbands saw them coming and tried to escape by running into the water. But that did not stop the angry wives for an instant. Into the water they waded. Each grabbed her recreant spouse by the hair and led him upon the shore, where they administered

MELIES.

BESSIE'S RIDE (July 20).—John Burton met Bessie Fields on her way home one day, and was for making love to her right then and there, but for the interruption of Crazy Joe, a half-witted boy, who always seemed to get in wrong. Burton was incensed, and, although Bessie protested, applied his whip to the demented boy, when Steve Ross, Bessie's sweetheart, happened along and rushed to the boy's rescue. Steve saw that Burton's attentions were not welcomed and ordered him off the scene.

Next day, both went to Mr. Fields, and proposed for Bessie's hand. When Burton learned that Steve had been accepted, he rushed from the house, fired back upon it, and fled. Of two shots spent, one hit and killed Mr. Fields. Steve, who was near by, shot at the fugitive, but missed him.

Burton hastened to a saloon where his friends were gathered, and hatched a plot to accuse Steve of the crime on circumstantial evidence. The sheriff was called and decided that Steve was guilty. But Burton was not satisfied. With his friends, he raided the jail, and made away with Steve, with the intention of hanging him.

Meanwhile, Crazy Joe, in his crazy ramblings, discovered a bullet lodged in the casing of the door, which had not penetrated the house. With this bit of evidence, Bessie, to whom he imparted this news, rode like mad to free her lover, as only one shot had escaped from Steve's revolver.

The sheriff joined in the ride to save a life. Steve was already roped about the neck when they arrived. Happiness was his, indeed. But who was the guilty one? A hasty examination of the guns on those present, disclosed the fact that the bullet corresponded with those used by Burton. He shrunk beneath their gaze, which was evidence enough for cowboys.

Steve was given freedom, Bessie happiness, and Burton—jail.

SELIG.

CAPTAIN KATE (July 13).—Two caravans meet on the desert—one headed by Howell and Clancy, two New York men, who are gathering animals for circus purposes—the other is led by an old animal tamer named Desmond and his beautiful daughter, whom the natives have nicknamed Capt. Kate. After exchanging cards, the caravans go their separate ways.

Desmond is stricken and dies, leaving Kate alone. She assumes her father's perilous business, leading her party of native hunters after big game. Later, one of the hunters is stricken and the superstitious followers of Capt. Kate, recognizing the nature of the disease, abandon the hunt and their leader, one servant alone remaining faithful to his mistress.

Kate, realizing that she can go no further without assistance, calls a halt and they erect a crude hut in which she is to live, while the servant goes in search of Clancy.

Scene of Kate's isolated life and her dangers follow. She is besieged by wild animals, who make her life a long nightmare of peril. Her only companions during this period are a pair of pet leopards. One scene shows an attack on the heroine's home by a lioness and the leopards are liberated to give the intruder combat. The leopards finally overcome the lioness, after a thrilling battle.

Meantime, the servant, who was dispatched with Kate's message, meets death on the desert. His body is found long afterwards by Clancy and with it, the message. Of course, the hunter makes all haste to rescue the isolated girl and succeeds. The rescue introduces the packing of animals for shipment, their handling in the forest and the wharf. There is a happy ending—Clancy being too busy courting Miss Desmond to heed his partner's admonition to help with the crated captives.

THE WAY OF THE ESKIMO (July 17).—A tribe of Labrador Eskimos are seen in their peculiar ceremony of bidding the sun good-bye. It is called "The Feast of the Adieu to the Sun."

Zak, a young Eskimo belonging to a tribe far removed from the village of old Chief Opetek and his family where the ceremony takes place, is one of the participants; he is visiting his sweetheart, the daughter of the chief. When the sun has disappeared Zak says "good-bye" and starts with his dog team, on his homeward journey over the ice. He comes upon a half-frozen hunter—a white man. Back to the village and into the hut of the chief the stranger is taken, cared for and nursed back to life. Zak again prepares to depart for home and, according to the Eskimo fashion of greeting and leave-taking among near and dear ones, smells the sleeves of and rubs nose with his sweetheart. After he has gone, and during the absence of the girl's parents from the hut, the white man ridicules the Eskimo method of bestowing caresses, and shows her the white man's way of making love. The old chief and his wife enter the hut in time to see the daughter elope with the stranger.

Winter has passed. Zak launches his kiack or canoe and starts upon his journey by water to the village of his sweetheart. His meeting with his sweetheart whom the white man long since deserted, their entrance into the summer village of old chief Opetek—the strange marraige ceremony of the Eskimos—portrayed by the natives themselves in their far off land make up an historical romance of peculiar value to the film world.

THE WARRANT (July 18).—Dan Thomas is the Sheriff of Pawnee County, Nebraska, in the raw days of the eighties. He adopts Nell, an orphan, and his efforts as a "governess" to the little girl are most amusing.

Nell has grown into beautiful womanhood, and Dan, loving her more than ever, writes to her his first love letter, asking her to be his wife. He leaves the letter where Nell will see it, and he goes out to his duties.

Nell has met Jim Rogers, a handsome young fellow, whom she loves, and Jim has proposed to her. The young people enter to ask Dan's consent. Dan blesses them, and then he destroys his written proposal.

Jim does not prove to be a model husband, and he quarrels with his wife because Dan kisses Nell. Dan finds the young wife crying. In her workbasket is an infant's shirt that Nell has just made. He places the shirt in his pocket and goes after Jim, who is drinking and gambling. Jim refuses to go home.

Later, in a quarrel, Jim shoots a gambler who has tried to kill him, and Dan is compelled to try to jail the husband of his beloved maid. Dan finds Jim, who in answer to Dan's plea to "go back and stand the trial like a man" demands to see a warrant for his arrest. Dan says, "this is my warrant," and he shows to Jim the little shirt of his newborn babe. Jim surrenders. The man whom Jim wounded proves to be "Buck" Reed, a notorious hold up man, and Jim goes back to Nell a free and a better man. Then Jim makes Dan kiss Nell.

Mr. Otis B. Thayer's performance of "Dan" and Miss Gertrude Bondhill's acting as "Nell" will prove a genuine treat to all who see this picture play.

THE PROFLIGATE (July 20).—Pauline, eldest daughter of Mons. Revere, has persuaded an old friend of her father's to teach her fencing. While in Paris, Pauline meets the dashing young captain of Hussars, Paul Dubois, and immediately they fall in love. They are married and she remains in Paris. Their happiness is rudely interrupted by a call to arms for the captain.

Napoleon with his staff is watching the battle, and Paul is carried to the rear sorely wounded. Mercedes has become a nurse, and is appointed to care for this patient. She little dreams he is the husband of her sister.

The captain and Mercedes develop an infatuation for each other, and poor little Mercedes writes her sister that though she has never seen her husband, she will soon present her own.

Pauline, her father and the master go to the hospital and Mercedes is overjoyed at seeing them. They go to a near-by inn, when who should come in search of Mercedes but the captain. Pauline quickly realizes the situation. He hurries away and sends a letter to Pauline to tell her sister what he cannot. Mercedes becomes demented at this perfidy.

Pauline determines to avenge the double wrong that has been done. Her opportunity comes while disguised as a French Hussar. Masked as travelers, she and the Master come upon the captain carousing.

She provokes a quarrel. He becomes so infuriated that he lunges at her with his sword and they fight in earnest. She being in the full possession of her wits and strength, has the advantage over him and quickly gives him the fatal wound.

He tears the mask from her face and in the moment of recognition he realizes his punishment and falls dead.

BOBBY, THE COWARD (July 13).—A little family, consisting of the old grandfather, Bobby and his sister, are in dire straits. Bobby has for some time been the little father of the family, but now, being out of work, he daily scans the newspaper in search of a clue of some employment. On this particular morning he starts out, but, as has been the case many times before, is unsuccessful. Coming home he is insulted by a couple of street thugs and fails to resent the insult, which occurrence his sweetheart witnesses, and brands him a despicable coward. This is rather a heavy blow to Bobby at such a time, when the whole world seems set against him, but on another occasion, when with renewed determination, he starts out again to look for work, he finds a lady's purse containing a large amount of money. The temptation is great to keep the find, but Bobby's honest nature repels this temptation, and he seeks out and returns to the lady her loss, receiving a note of a large denomination as a reward. The thugs see this and their cupidity is aroused. They follow Bobby a roundabout way home, making up their minds to return in the evening and secure the money. This they do, but Bobby may have let the insult go by, still, when it came to the protection of his little family, he became lion-hearted, knocking the two thugs out and handing them over to the police, proving to his sweetheart that he was not such a coward after all.

THE JEALOUS HUSBAND July (10).—An overdomesticated husband leaves for the office, and while there several friends try to persuade him to go on a fishing trip, but he answers, "No, boys, my wife won't let me." They say, "We'll fix that." So taking him to a doctor friend, they form a plan. The doctor tells him to go home and pretend he is seized with a nervous affliction, and his wife is sure to telephone for him. The scheme works great and the doctor, upon arriving, insists that the husband must go away at once, attended only by a nurse he will select. Peace and quiet are what he needs. The nurse is one of the fishing party, and away they go, on a wild ride for the beach. The husband is now at the shore, having the time of his life, while at home his mother has been taken very ill. Wifey goes for the doctor, but he happens to be away in the country, so she hastens there in an auto to get him. On the return trip they pass the spot where hubby is enjoying "peace and quiet." They don't see hubby, but hubby sees them, and maybe he doesn't get excited. Well, the chase after that auto baffles description; and the arrival home—no more "peace and quiet" for hubby for some time.

PATHE.

LOVE AND CHEESE (July 10).—Max is about to start out to call on his sweetheart; but, before he leaves, the maid, who is deeply in love with Max and wants to cause him as much difficulty as possible, puts a nice, ripe piece of limburger cheese in the tail pocket of his coat. Max having arrived at the young lady's house, suggests a song, and the whole company joint heartily in the chorus; but, overcome one by one by the energetic odor of this piece of cheese, they quietly slink away. Disgusted, Max leaves and the smell of the cheese still pursues him. He stops at the café to get a drink, but the innocent piece of cheese in his pocket seems to take an interest in its work and smells most enthusiastically. Everybody leaves, the waiter is unable to collect the price of the drink. Two policemen try to arrest Max, but are overcome, and finally Max, determined to find the cause of his unpopularity, commences to disrobe. When he drops his coat, the fool thing runs down the street as fast as it can go, with Max in full pursuit. Arriving at the house, the coat jumps on a chair and unrolls itself, and that classy piece of cheese jumps out of his pocket, raises the lid of the cheese jar and crawls under it.

TRAGIC WEDDING (July 12).—A young girl is about to be forced into an unwelcome marriage by the terms of her father's will. She writes to her lover, a gypsy, telling him of her plight, and he and his band rescue her as she is on her way to the marriage. Her guardian, the man she is to marry, gives pursuit with his followers and this ends up in a terrific battle to the death, in which the man who was to be her husband dies in the poor girl's arms.

FATHER AND SON (July 13).—Tom and his son stand by the bedside of his dead wife, and in heartbroken tones the father and his son try as best they may to console each other for their loss. Time passes, however, and Tom gets infatuated with a woman who makes him spend all of his meager earnings. Things go from bad to worse; the father and son become estranged and finally Tom loses his job in the mill. Some days later, after he has had a quarrel with his sweetheart, he wants to buy a gift for her, and having no money, he decides to break into a wealthy man's house and rob. In the meantime, his son has left him and has been adopted by the very man whose house Tom decides to rifle. As Tom is about to make his escape with his loot, he is discovered by his son, who persuades him to flee, and the boy is discovered by the owner of the house with the bag of stolen articles. Of course his arrest follows, but at the police station all is explained, the father and son reconciled, and the story ends happily with them reunited in their little home.

VEIL OF HAPPINESS (July 14).—A Chinese mandarin named Chang is blind and finds his only happiness is the the caresses of his wife and the adoration of his son. One day, while out walking with his servant, Chang comes across a sorcerer who recognizes his rank and begs to be allowed to give the great man a potent liquid which will restore his sight. Chang submits to the administration of the sorcerer's cure and in a moment, for the first time in his life, he beholds the beauty of the world; everything about him holds untold ecstasies for his unaccustomed sight. He finds beauty in the very soil on which he walks. Hastening home he admonishes his servant not to say anything, but decides to surprise his family. Stealing into the house he peeks through the door into the study where his son and his tutor are supposed to be at work. There he witnesses his son's burlesque of his own helplessness and the tutor crawling on the floor in mirth. In the garden he discovers his young wife in the embrace of a neighboring mandarin. Aghast at his misfortune he returns to his own room where he finds the little bottle, the contents of which restored his sight. On the label are written the words "BEWARE; three drops will restore your sight, but ten will remove it forever." Feeling that sightless ignorance is better than knowledge of the unfaithfulness and hypocrisy of mankind, he pours the fatal ten drops into his eyes and returns forever to blindness.

DAD'S BOY (July 15).—John Chester is a country storekeeper who works tooth and nail to get enough money to put his son through college. To be sure he has had to mortgage the store a couple of times to raise the money to do this, but his son knows nothing of these mortgages. When the boy returns from college, John Chester hopes to have him as his partner in business, but the son prefers the law and goes to the city to make his mark in the world. One fine day the mortgages fall due and old Chester has no money to meet them; the place must be sold. Saddened and discouraged the old man and his faithful wife watch the sheriff begin the sale. But there has been another man at work; an old friend of the family has telegraphed to this boy telling him of his father's plight, and the son, only too glad to return his father's beneficence, hastens to the scene of the sale and, unknown to all but a few, buys in the store and in a lovely loving scene returns the property free and clear to his dad.

VITAGRAPH.

THE LURE OF VANITY (July 18).—Miss Edna White is very much grieved when she has not a suitable gown to wear at a party.

Mrs. Donald, a wealthy customer, calls and asks Edna to try the dress on she has bought for her inspection. It answers her purposes, and Edna is instructed to deliver the dress that night, on her way home. The thought comes to Edna's mind to keep the dress over night and wear it to the party. She dresses herself in the costly raiment and makes a dazzling figure and more especially in the eyes of her proud escort. She is in the midst of the dance when her dress is torn by a passing dancer. Frightened, she hastily withdraws with her escort, and returns to her home, to spend the balance of the night in a vain effort to repair the damage, but she finds it impossible.

In the morning she delivers the dress to Mrs. Donald, who discovers the tear, immediately returns the garment to the modiste and demands an explanation. Edna is accused, after an investigation, of being guilty of ruining the gown and is on the point of being arrested when Mrs. Donald feeling sorry for the poor girl, pays the bill and tells Edna she hopes the lesson she has just learned will be a lasting one.

ON A TRAMP STEAMER (July 19).—Jim is a stoker on a tramp steamer, meets Joe, a boyhood friend. Joe is down on his luck, Jim's heart melts in sympathy for him, offers him the shelter of his home and gives him a job as his assistant on the steamer. While eating from Jim's table and partaking of his hospitality, Joe meets Meg, Jim's sweetheart, and unknown to Jim, thrusts his attentions upon her. Her love for Jim antagonizes Joe and he becomes very jealous of his friend. Meg has had a new photograph of herself taken, inscribes "To my boy from his loving Meg," which she intends to send to Jim after he has sailed. She places it in her work-basket, from which Joe steals it.

The steamer on which the men are employed sails on a long trip. During the voyage Jim often looks at Meg's picture, thinking of the time when he can claim her as his wife. Joe notes this and to disturb Jim's mind he shows him the picture which he has stolen and tells his benefactor that Meg gave it to him. Later on while they are working in the furnace room, Joe speaks of Meg's duplicity. Jim defends her name; and a fight ensues. Jim knocks his antagonist insensible. During the fight the vessel strikes a rock and the water is fast pouring into the room; Jim again shows his magnanimity by lifting his enemy in his arms and carrying him to safety on the deck. The small boat is loosened from its davits and the unconscious man placed in it. Jim rushes back to the cabin to secure some of his belongings. The little boat cannot hold to, is swept away from the wreck and Jim is left alone.

Joe with the rest of the crew manage to reach port and he makes his way back to Jim's sweetheart and tells her that Jim was lost at sea. He tries to induce her to marry him. From the unfortunate steamer Jim manages to save himself on a raft; he is picked up by a passing steamer, which carries him home, where he arrives in time to contradict Joe's statements, and makes himself and Meg two of the happiest people in the world.

THE SKY PILOT (July 21).—Charles Rawden is a man of violent temper, which is shown in a quarrel with his friend, Tom Wallace. Nellie, to whom both men are paying court, accepts Tom as the more desirable life partner.

Rawden's temper is uncontrollable; he becomes involved in a saloon fight and almost kills his man.

Nellie, with her husband, goes to Alaska. Rawden, who is now called "The Sky Pilot," is engaged in missionary work in the same place; he accomplishes much good, and makes many converts to the Cause.

An epidemic of disease breaks out among the people. "The Sky Pilot" is called to help in many a cabin and home. His friend, Tom Wallace, is stricken down with the disease. Charles insists upon sending Tom to the nearest military outpost and persists in sending him there on his own dog sled, while he goes afoot.

Journeying through the snow-clad country in the intense cold, he is overcome with that feeling of numbness. He falls prostrate and helpless, where he is found by "White Bird," the Indian girl. She carries him to the Indian village, where he is revived, and after complete recovery takes up the trail to the outpost, to which his friend, Tom Wallace, had been taken. Arriving at the army headquarters, he learns of his friend's death and burial.

Two years later "The Sky Pilot's" lifelong romance has a happy ending; he marries Nellie, Tom's widow.

THE RETURN OF "WIDOW" POGSON'S HUSBAND (July 22).—Bill Pogson works because his wife makes him, and she sets the example by her industry in running a very successful delicatessen shop. Bill is wont to stay out late at night and enjoy the society of his boon companions. He does this once too often. Mrs. Pogson awaits his return and lays down the law to him in a very forceful manner. This Bill resents, and makes up his mind that his wife can very well get along without him, while he can maintain his independence elsewhere.

He goes along the waterfront, where he throws down his overcoat in disgust. He is aroused from his meditation by the sound of a passing freight train, which he boards, and is on his way to any old place.

A policeman passing along the wharf finds Bill's coat and a discarded hat, which he picks up. In one of the pockets of the coat he finds a letter addressed to Bill, and concludes that it is a case of suicide. He takes the coat and hat to Mrs. Pogson, who mourns her husband as dead. Her loneliness is somewhat relieved by the attentions of the good-looking policeman and also by the vigorous courtship of Joe Stebbins. She will have neither of them, and Stebbins lays a deep plot to make himself a hero by engaging some one to act the part of a burglar, who will enter Mrs. Pogson's home, while he rescues her from the desperate intruder.

About this time Bill Pogson finds his way back to his old place of residence, somewhat the worse for wear and not at all recognizable by his friends. Stebbins sees him and engages him to act the part of burglar. The night is dark and after the "widow" has retired for the night, Bill makes his way into the room. His wife is prepared for just such an emergency, and appears, pistol in hand, and holds his "hands up" at the point of her weapon. She recognizes her long-lost Bill, they fall upon each other's neck in joyous greeting.

Bill tells her about Stebbins' little game. She covers her husband up and fires her pistol in the air. In response, Stebbins appears. She gives him her revolver and tells him she has killed the burglar. Mrs. Pogson calls her friend and admirer of the brass buttons, tells him of her husband's return and of the little joke she would like to play on the persistent Stebbins by accusing him of entering her premises in duranve vile. The "cop" lays violent hands upon him and gives him the full benefit of his strong right arm and a good swift kick, after Stebbins had paid him well for his release.

GAUMONT.

JIMMIE AS A PHILANTHROPIST (July 15).—Jimmie is a bootblack, "but for all his dirty hide he's white, clear white inside," and when he sees a woman and her little girl crying because of their hunger he offers to help them.

For a little time, in order to contribute to their support, he begs from the passersby and gives the proceeds to the poor woman. However, later in the day he notices a fashionable lady leading a little dog, and watches her until she sits down upon a park bench, and forgets her pet. Jimmie now unties the leash, takes the dog and fastens an old boot in its place. He then escapes.

The lady continues her walk until met by a policeman who calls her attention to the fact that she is leading a dilapidated shoe. She is very naturally astonished and chagrined, but offers a fair reward for the return of her pet.

Jimmie, who has been following at a distance, returns the dog to the lady, who forgets the reward. The police insist that the boy should have it, and after Jimmie has been paid he returns to his friends and gives them the money, and receives their heartfelt thanks for his day of kindness.

FROLICSOME FLORRIE (July 15).—Florrie is an only child whose ambition is to get into as much mischief as possible and who succeeds admirably in accomplishing this end. She manages to find a number of out of the ordinary things to do which prove highly amusing to us, but so exasperating to her parents that they add to our amusement by getting so excited that they put themselves in numerous embarrassing positions.

A SHOT FROM THE BRUSH (July 18).—Telling how a poor woman, who, when aided by an old soldier, proves her gratitude and devotion to the man who had befriended her, even at the expense of losing her own child.

An officer of the French army, bearing important dispatches, is pursued by the Cossacks. He takes refuge in his father's house, where the patriotic servant gives her child to the hostile soldiers rather than betray the messenger. The child is re-captured in a thrilling encounter, during which some exciting horsemanship is shown.

UNDER THE PALMS OF TUNIS, AFRICA (July 18).—An interesting film, illustrating Nefta and the surrounding country in the desert of Tunis. There is a panoramic view of Nefta from Chott-Djerid, showing its temples and buildings and the oasis which is bounded by immense dunes forming the Nefta Basket. The lake at the foot of the dunes is shown, with palm trees reflected in the water. At the source a number of native women are drawing water in quaintly shaped vessels made from sheep hides. There is a roadway through the palms, and a bean merchant is pursuing his business in the oasis. A Marabout, or tomb of a saint, is shown.

JIMMIE, THE DETECTIVE (July 22).—The famous boy actor is the victim of a light-fingered rogue who takes his watch. When the police fail to arrest the criminal because of lack of evidence, Jimmie, by using several disguises shadows the rascals until enough proof is found to carry the case through to an exciting close.

IN THE SHADOW OF VESUVIUS (July 22).—Scenes in and about Naples. An interesting scenic film, commencing with a panorama of Naples itself, Vesuvius, views of the port, and a fishing encampment near the Chateau de l'Luef. After other items of general interest we have a charming picture of the Bay of Naples.

THE BACKWOODSMAN'S SUSPICION (July 15).—Wilton Shaw, a young author, has been advised by his physician to go West for his health and the opening scenes of this picture finds him in a little town in Montana, seeking board and lodging. Jim Walker, a backwoodsman, offers him a home with him and his wife, and he accepts. Arriving at the rough hut of the Walkers, Shaw is introduced to Walker's wife. Finding that the young woman, though quite beautiful, is illiterate, the young author decides to use his spare time in teaching her. Coming home one evening, young Walker finds the two together poring over their books, and although it is evident that their pursuit of learning has been innocent enough, Walker shows that he is jealous of his boarder. Called away the next day to fight forest fires, young Shaw and Mrs. Walker are left alone, when a telegram from Shaw's mother advises him to return home immediately, as his wife is dangerously ill. Realizing that he cannot catch the overland train by going over the main road, the backwoodsman volunteers to show him a short but dangerous cut through the mountains, and in order that she be not impeded by cumbersome skirts, she gets into one of her husband's suits. They have been gone an hour when Walker returns, and finding the two gone, suspects that they have eloped. Intensely jealous and determined to have revenge upon Shaw, Walker seizes a gun and saddling his horse starts in pursuit of the couple. Mrs. Walker has returned a few moments after her husband had left and learns from her husband's friend what the latter intends to do. Knowing that she alone can save the young author's life, she again mounts her horse and starts in pursuit of her husband, arriving at the station immediately after him, and just in time to forestall the tragedy, after which all is explained.

THE ROSARY (July 14).—Mrs. Payne, an invalid, is propped up in bed with her little son kneeling beside her when there is a knock at the door, and the priest, Father Grant ,enters. Realizing that the woman is beyond physical aid, the old priest goes through the last rites of the church and the invalid mother falls back dead. Feeling a great love for the little fellow, Father Grant resolves to adopt him and when he consents, leads him away to his home. Ten years later the boy has resolved to become a priest and has already taken the preliminary steps. One day he is sent by Father Grant to the home of an old friend, where he meets Ruth Martin, a beautiful and innocent young girl. This first meeting results in the mutual love of both, although each hardly realize what it means to them. A few months later finds the young man where he must foreswear the church or the girl, and with aching heart young Payne resolves to sacrifice his sweetheart for the priesthood. Alone that night his heart is filled with bitter regret, as he realizes he has lost Ruth forever. Tempted to see her once more, and if possible to persuade Father Grant to release him from his vows, he steals back to the girl's cottage that night, and tells her of his love. It is she who awakens him to the folly of the step, and she tells him she will be glad to sacrifice all worldly pleasures if he will return to the church. Turning away, ashamed and repentant, he moves slowly out of the house, while the girls drops ou her knees with her head bowed in agony.

THE TIE THAT BINDS (July 19).—George Brown is not a bad man, but indulges in drink and pays too little attention to his wife and child.

A wealthy lady of the town happens to know the situation and offers to take care of her little daughter for Mrs. Brown. The mother decides to send her child to the kind lady in order to keep the little girl from suffering because of her father's neglect.

George now realizes the wickedness of his behavior and begins to work seriously. He is soon in a position to bring the child home and care for her properly.

A ROUND-UP IN CHILI (July 19),—Rodeo, a favorite Chilian sport. Fete day. Scenes in the arena. Caballeros chasing a bull. On a Chilian racecourse. Leveling the ground. Mountain background. Great concourse. Arranging the events. Saddling and mounting a bull. Unusual scenes. Awaiting his enemies. Biped and quadruped. The bull goaded. Chased by dogs and horsemen. The bull victorious, horsemen dislodged, bull freed.

THE NEW CHURCH CARPET (July 18).—Mrs. Wilson is the treasurer of the Ladies' Aid Society of the Readville Methodist Church. The church is sorely in need of a new carpet and the members of the Aid Society are putting forth all efforts and energy to purchase one. They decide to give an entertainment and supper at Sister Brown's house, the proceeds to go toward buying the new carpet.

The affair is a great success. The proceeds are intrusted to Mrs. Wilson, the treasurer.

The next morning Mrs. Wilson receives a letter informing her that her daughter, who lives in Boston, is very ill and wants her mother to come to her. Mrs. Wilson asks her husband for the money to make the trip, but he refuses. She remembers the society's carpet money. The temptation is too great and she takes the money and goes to her daughter. The daughter under her mother's care grows better and when she leaves for home, she takes with her her daughter's little girl, Mary.

They go to the meeting, taking little Mary with them and when the others rise to sing the hymn, Mrs. Wilson is so overcome that she sits in her seat, staring ahead apparently neither hearing nor seeing.

Little Mary has overheard their previous conversation, and realizing that her grandmother is in some trouble about money, unties her little handkerchief and gives her a penny which her grandfather had given her earlier in the day. He sees the generous action of the child and is touched by it. The treasurer of the Aid Society is asked to make her report, but before she can make her confession, her husband has opened his purse and counted out the amount. This he gives to little Mary, whose tiny hands press it into those of her grief-stricken grandmother. Mrs. Wilson hands in her funds and sinks into her seat, where her husband clasps her hand in mute forgiveness and love.

A FAMOUS DUEL (July 19).—At a café, a young lady's handkerchief falls to the floor, just as a young man passes, who, quickly picking it up, returns it to her. Her escort, a Frenchman, slaps the young man's face for his kindness. Friends stop a further disturbance. Later, the young man receives a card, invising him to a duel. He accepts, but after regrets. His friends, knowing that he is no swordsman, sends a letter to the Frenchman's pretty one, telling her to stop the duel, as the young man is an expert swordsman. On the field of honor, where the two are preparing for the terrible duel, the young lady arrives just in time to stop the conflict. The young man is much relieved, and "scoots" off, much to the disgust of the Frenchman.

THE CAPTURE OF FORT TICONDEROGA (July 21).—The action opens in the humble home of Betty Hampton, whose mother is very ill. Tom Driscoll, a typical "Green Mountain Boy," to whom Betty is engaged, brings her the coat of his new Continental uniform, to have the buttons changed, when they are interrupted by a hail outside.

Hastily hiding the coat, lest it be seen by some enemy of the cause, they are much relieved to find that their caller is none other than Ethan Allen, the leader of the Green Mountain Boys. Allen has just received word of the battels of Concord and Lexington and decides to take steps to aid the revolt against Great Britain on his own responsibility. He imparts to them his plan to capture the British strongholds on Lake Champlain, the first one to be Fort Ticonderoga. He and Tom go to a well-knwn glen in the woods, having sent Nesbobee, an Indian scout, to call in all the leaders for a council. This meeting results in their eagerly following Allen's lead and they depart to collect their followers. Allen, Tom and Neshobee are on their way to the vilage when they cme across Betty, who is being annoyed by several of the soldiers of the fort. Quickly putting them to rout, they send Neshobee home with Betty and continue their way to the meeting place.

Arriving home, Betty finds her mother in a very serious condition. She sends Neshobee for a neighbor, who, upon arriving, says a doctor is needed at once. The only doctor in the neighborhood is at the fort, so Betty goes to him, taking Neshobee as escort. She is ushered into the Commander's presence while the officers are banqueting and all more or less the worse for liquor. She states her errand, and while the doctor has gone for his kit, they attempt to make her drink the King's health, which she indignantly refuses to do. Arriving home she finds her mother has passed the crisis safely and at once resolves to tell Allen of the conditions at the fort and urge him to attack at once. Allen upon hearing her news, decides to attack at once without waiting for reinforcements and, gathering his men about him, eighty-three in all, they silently make their way across the lake. Creeping silently up the steep slope to the fort they overpower the sleepy sentinel and enter the fort unmolested.

Beating upon Captain De LaPlace's door Allen rouses him out of bed and when the sleepy commander opens the door, he finds himself confronted by Allen, sword in hand, demanding "Surrender, In the name of the Great Jehovah and the Continental Congress!" and his stronghold in possession of the Green Mountain Boys.

He surrenders the fort and without firing a shot, the American heroes gain possession of the strongest fortification on Lake Champlain, together with all the storesfi munition and cannon, a great number of which were afterward used to drive the British out of Boston.

Allen leads Betty out before his men and publicly thanks her for her share of the night's work which is echoed by cheers from the men, while she blushingly hides her head on Tom's shoulder.

THE LITTLE WAYFARER (July 6).—A wandering, homeless boy comes upon a beautiful castle. A richly dressed boy is feeding the animals in the yard. The poor boy pleads for food, and the butler gives him a piece of bread, but the wealthy boy snatches it from him. Later the rich boy, while boating, falls overboard and is saved from drowning by the little wayfarer. The rich boy, thoroughly ashamed of himself, does everything he can to force a reward upon his rescuer, and his parents try to induce the urchin to live with them, but he refuses their offers and goes on his happy, aimless way.

AMBROSIO.

A WRONG TELEPHONE CALL (July 12).—Banker Dorval is ruined by gambling. Thoughts of suicide are dispelled by the sight of his little daughter. At this trying moment a great temptation comes to him, as the telephone bell rings and by mistake he is connected with Lady Robert, who has asked Central for her jeweler, and when Dorval answers the 'phone, asks him to call for her jewels to be repaired. He tries to secure them, but she becomes suspicious and discovers the fraud. He reveals his identity and implores her mercy and she finally allows him to depart. He has learned a lesson, however, and applies himself to his work and recoups, in a measure, his lost fortune. Some years later, as Lady Robert is coming out of church, Dorval's daughter presents her with a huge bouquet, saying her father has commanded her to love Lady Robert, and as the father, with a courtly bow, salutes her. Lady Robert feels that her charitable act has not been in vain.

GENEROUS COWBOYS (July 14).—Two stranded actresses start a school for the cowboys. They arrange to receive a fake message that their mother's home is to be lost unless $100 is sent at once. Their tears melt the cowboys' hearts and one by one they are separated from that amount. The girls make a quick get-away and are seen on the last platform of the train waving good-byes to the angry cowpunchers, who have galloped to the station to catch them.

A RED GIRL'S HEART (July 11).—Loving the same girl, two Indian braves use all their savage wiles to win the object of their affection. The inevitable happens, and the red men fight to the death. The victor is banished from the tribe and departs on his lonely way. In the night the girl steals from camp and joins her lover, and together they live happily.

RELIANCE.

THOU SHALT NOT LIE (July 8).—Torn from the bedside of his sick wife, the conscript is enrolled into the army. The woman gets worse and calls for her husband in her delirium. The good priest sends word to him and he deserts from guard duty and hurries home. A squad of soldiers is sent to his house to arrest him and he hides in the attic. His young son, who has been chastised for lying and taught the commandmeut, "Thou shalt not lie," when questioned by the soldiers, admits his father is in the house and reveals his hiding place. At the court-martial, the father is about to be sentenced to be shot when the priest enters the tent and in an eloquent plea, explains the situation to the stern old general, whose heart is moved and who dismisses the charge and restores the father to his family.

THE TURNING POINT (July 12).—Unable to further endure her husband's cruelty, a woman leaves her husband, secures a divorce and goes back to her old home. While canoeing, she falls into the water aud is rescued by a wealthy young man, who courts and marries her. Her first husband has gone the downward path and has become a burglar. He breaks into the home of his former wife, and in a thrilling duel with her husband, is wounded. The woman rushes into the room at the sound of the pistol shots and recognizes him. To avoid unwelcome notoriety, he is allowed to depart and goes out through the window into the darkness. The dramatic worth of this picture is apparent, as James Kirkwood and Mace Greenleaf, two of the best legitimate leading men in the country, interpret the principal roles. Many of the scenes are staged in beautiful country spots, presenting artistic backgrounds of verdure, flowers and rippling waters.

Advance Announcement of The Third Feature in the "Life As It Is" Series

This series consists of films of exceptional esthetic merit which present dramas delineating real life stories with real life endings rather than the highly tragical or the perfectly happy climax common to most plays.

"A SOCIETY MOTHER"

OR

MARRIED AGAINST HER WILL

Madame Tabor, a social climber, persuades her daughter to marry a dissolute nobleman because of his wealth and social standing. His brutality soon forces the young bride to return to her home where she is welcomed sympathetically by her father and sisters, but her mother insists that their position in society is endangered and returns with her to the drunken husband. For the sake of appearances she is forced to resign herself to the prospect of a wretched existence for the rest of her life.

factory, and a sweetheart, and really did not worry because of her lack of money. But everything took a change for the worse when she "became a heroine."

There was a fire panic in the factory where she worked, and Susie was the only person who could cope with the emergency. The other girls, thinking of previous disasters, became panic stricken and tried to jump out of the window. But Susie drove them back, scared them into obeying her, formed them into line finally and marched them out of the building in some kind of order. There really was no fire, as it turned out, but had it not been for the work of one quick-witted girl, there would undoubtedly have been a heavy loss of life.

The papers lauded Susie to the skies, especially when they found that she had broken her arm in an effort to restrain the frightened workers. And a rich woman read about it, decided that "poor little Susie" should have a chance, and took her to her rich home.

There the girl had everything that money could buy, but strange to say, she was unhappy. She missed her old friends, the dances where she could "spiel," and that shabby sweetheart of hers. And she stole away one night, reappeared at the factory, got her old job back, and was again thoroughly, genuinely happy. For she was among the people she understood and who understood her, and did not have to worry about what the butler thought, or what was good or bad form.

TWO LITTLE GIRLS (July 21).—A young wife, weary of the monotony of her existence, listens to the flattering speeches of a worthless man, and in a moment of weakness elopes, taking her infant with her. But she is speedily disillusioned, for the man for whom she sacrificed her life turns out to be vicious, idle and ungrateful, and finally leaves her to fight the battle of existence with the world alone. She manages to keep a roof over the head of herself and child for a while, but when a fire wipes out their home, she gives up in despair. Mother and child tramp away, intending to seek the aid of relatives in a city, but on the road the mother dies. Her last act is to give the child her locket, a gift from the husband in happier days, hoping that it may prove a talisman of fortune for her.

In the meantime the husband has secured a divorce and in the course of time, weds again, his second wife being a widow with one child, a little girl. He has prospered financially, and it comes as a shock to him when he hears that his former wife and their child have perished in a fire that destroyed their home.

The poor little girl, in the course of her wanderings, reaches a city and sees a number of happy, well-dressed little children dancing about a May pole. She would have slunk away, but another child, who arrives in an auto, invites her to come in, and forces her to enter the playground. Later, affected by her story, the little girl takes the shabby stranger home with her, confident that the parents who love her will make life happy for the child who has no one to care for her.

Her expectations are realized, for the shabby child turns out to be the daughter of the rich man, and she is welcomed and made to feel that in her new home she has not only fond parents, but a loving sister.

AMERICAN.

THE RANCHMAN'S NERVE (July 17).—Fred Peters leaves his home and intercepts the express rider on the lonely mountain road, making away with a rich haul. The express rider hurries to the sheriff's office and notifies him: a posse is formed and they start in pursuit. Safely hidden among the rocks the "terror" fires, wounding one of the deputies in the arm. After this catastrophe the posse return, their ardor cooled to take the "bad man" of the mountains. Arrived at the sheriff's office, the express rider binds up the injured arm. The sheriff announced that he needs a man of nerve to lead the posse and the express rider agrees to find the man. Going to the general store, where the boys are loitering, he takes a corner of his handkerchief in his mouth and dares any man to fight him with a bowie, holding the other corner of the handkerchief in his mouth. Nobody accepts the challenge. Bob Steele comes up and offers to fight him any style. Taking the other corner of the handkerchief in his mouth, he attacks the express rider so fiercely that he is compelled to drop his end, leaving Bob the winner in the unique deal. They ask him to lead the posse, and he willingly agrees to go.

Again the posse arrive at the scene of the hold-up and Fred Peters, resting his rifle on a rock, fires and kills a deputy. Steele turns to the posse and urges them to go after the desperado. The men hesitate and Bob, drawing his gun from its holster, throwing it to the ground, declares, "I'll bring him in, single-handed, without a gun." Leaving the posse, he enters the dense thicket leading up to the outlaw's retreat. Fred Peters, thinking he has again halted pursuit, catches his rifle in a crevice in the rocks, and, taking up the bag of gold, returns to his home. Bob Steele has picked up his trail and follows him relentlessly, now standing upright in the open and now crawling upon hands and knees through the dense underbrush and over the dangerous brow of the cliffs. He comes to the crevice in the rocks and finds fresh evidence of the outlaw's recent presence, and, with the instinct of an Indian scout, he follows the trail.

When he arrives at the outlaw's home he meets Lottie Peters and explains his mission. While he is talking Fred comes out and covers him with his gun. Lottie throws herself in front of Steele and Fred Peters is halted in his murderous design. Bob Steel, always fearless, steps from behind her and, pointing to his heart, dares the outlaw to shoot him. All this is disconcerting to Fred, who does not wish to commit murder in the presence of his mother and sister. At the psychological moment Bob springs on the outlaw and, wresting his gun from him, he turns the tables completely. Covering him with the gun he quietly remarks, "For the sakes of these women, I'll give you one hour to get across the line."

After his departure Steele examines the gun and, throwing it down, he starts down the mountain trail. Lottie picks up her brother's gun and watches the ranchman out of sight. Instead of obeying Stele's mandate, the outlaw hurries to where his rifle is cached and lies in wait for the fearless man. Steele, unconscious of his danger, stops to drink at a mountain stream. He is followed by Lottie, who has a presentiment of danger, for she knows her brother's treacherous nature. She sees her brother on the cliff above and utters a cry of warning. Fred's rifle flashes and the ranchman's hat is shot from his head. Almost simultaneously the sharp crack of her gun is heard and, mortally wounded, Fred falls over the cliff to the table rock below. Without a word of remorse, or even a backward glance, Lottie wends her way with the man whose life she has saved, back to her home and waiting mother.

WHEN THE EAST COMES WEST (July 20).—Joe Ellison, the young foreman of Lazy Ranch, finds the routine of ranch life rather irksome and seeing a matrimonial advertisement in an Eastern newspaper, he answers it. When the answer to him arrives, accompanied by a photograph of the lady, he is subjected to a great deal of chaffing by the boys, but accepts it all in a very good natured way. The Ranch Cook essays some good advice, but the foreman is determined and sends for the lady. On the day of her expected arrival the foreman departs to met the train and, during his absence, the boys prepare to give the bride and groom a rousing reception. With studions care a sign is made, "Welcome to Lazy Ranch" and enough rice is procured to feed a Chinese regiment.

In the meantime Joe has met his correspondent. They are mutually pleased and, entering the buckboard, they drive to the office of the Justice of the Peace and are married.

Driving home they are greeted by a shower of rice and the bride is established as the mistress of the ranch. The cook's wife had previously held this position and, feeling that the bride has usurped her rights, she starts to make things unpleasant for the Eastern girl.

On the morning that Joe starts for the round-up things have become unbearable for the foreman's wife and she determines to return to her home. The cook finds her crying and learns of her homesickness and offers to drive her to the gulch where she can catch the Overland train. He is trying to comfort her, when his wife accidentally witnesses the little scene and misconstrues their actions for love. Her suspicions become a certainty, when the cook drives up with the buckboard and the foreman's wife, coming out of the ranch house, hands her a note addressed to Joe and then drives away with the cook. The cook's wife runs to the corral and, mounting her horse, rides rapidly to the round-up and, finding Joe, announces, "your wife ran away with my husband." Without waiting to hear more Joe starts in pursuit of the pair and, coming upon them by the roadside, he ropes the cook and his wife and ties them to a tree.

Leaving them to whatever fate may have in store for them, he sets out for the round-up. He meets the cook's wife, who now delivers the note to him. Tearing it open he eagerly scans the page and learns the truth. He hastily returns to the tree, liberates his prisoners and tries to explain to his injured wife the cause of his jealousy. The cook is treated to a lecture from his wife's tongue, as she attacks him with both fists. The foreman's wife promises to forgive her husband if he will take her East, which he agrees to do and they renew their vows with a perfect understanding of each other.

BABY'S RATTLE July 12).—Mrs. Biffem decides that she wants to go out for a walk and instructs hubby to stay home and mind the baby. He objects to this arrangement strenuously, but after a squabble he has to comply with the dictates of his spouse. We next see him alone with the baby, who is making good use of his lungs. Mr. Biffem, almost wild with the noise, throws the baby on the bed and gives it its rattle, while he tries to quiet his jumping nerves with his pipe.

It is in this position that Mrs. Biffem finds her family when she returns and as she goes to the baby she is horrified at not seeing the rattle in its accustomed place. After a wild search they arrive at a mutual decision—the baby has swallowed the rattle. Biffem is hustled off to the doctor and he immediately returns with this worthy, who, after a careful examination, decides that an operation is necessary.

The baby is examined with the X-ray, and the doctor shows the now thoroughly frightened parents the position of the rattle in the baby's body. Making a more thorough examination, he turns the baby over and is astonished to find that the rattle is now on the other side. The baby is held up and subjected to another X-ray examination, and this time nothing of the rattle is seen. Thoroughly mystified, the doctor stands in deep thought. Like a flash he removes the baby from the pillow upon which it has been resting and reaching under the pillow he brings forth the missing rattle. The X-ray has been penetrating both the baby and the pillow. Taking the baby the doctor returns it unharmed to the greatly relieved parents.

THE STRANGER IN CAMP (July 22).—After having endured the abuse of her drunken husband as long as she could, Ethel Marsden left him and went West to teach school in a mining camp. Mack, a miner, fell in love with the attractive Eastern girl. Ethel was attracted to the honest, tender, strong man. Still, she did not forget that she was a married woman. Mack thought she liked him yet could not understand her coolness at times. Ethel was afraid to tell him, for fear she would lose her position.

Then one day, Ethel's husband arrived in town, and found his way out to her school and found her in conversation with Mack. He started to abuse her and the young miner came to her defense. Of course, Mack did not know that this was her husband. Determined to get revenge for his humiliations before his wife, Harry Marsden plotted with two greasers. Ethel overheard the plot, by which a decoy note was to be sent to Mack, purporting to come from Ethel, asking him to meet her at the schoolhouse. Mack received the note and went to the schoolroom, where Ethel's husband and the two greasers pounced upon him. After a terrific struggle, the young miner was bound and gagged.

Meanwhile, Ethel had reached the sheriff's office and notified that officer of the plot. The sheriff quickly called together a posse and arrived at the schoolhouse, where the three men were just about to put an end to the young miner. Ethel's husband in attempting to escape, was shot by the sheriff and killed.

Thus in an instant the young woman found a solution to more than one difficult problem. By the death of her husband, she was at once freed from a brute, and put in a position, where she could marry the man of her choice.

THAT JUNE BUG (July 12)—Men and women, lightly clad in ducks and muslins, are lolling about, or dancing to the strains of a violin. Clifford Young and his fiancee have just finished a dance, and as they recline upon the lawn beneath the shade of a large elm, we see Clifford, ever an anon reach for his lower extremities, and subject them to a vigorous scratching. In fact this operation is repeated so frequently that it attracts the attention of his girl, and finally his action becomes so bothersome that he goes to the dressing room, where, behind a curtain, he removes his trousers, in order to extract a June bug that is subsequently proven to be the cause of all the trouble. As he vigorously shakes them out of the window, he loses his grasp and they fall to the ground, where they are immediately picked up by Weary Willie, who is passing at that moment.

Horrified at the predicament in which he finds himself, and not knowing how he is going to make his appearance upon the lawn without his trousers, he induces his friend to lend him his trousers that he may go in search of Weary. Again correctly garbed, Clifford goes out to the party, where the dancing and genial company tend to make him forget all about the tramp with his trousers, and his friend back in the dressing room, trouserless, and whom, as time passes, and no Clifford puts in appearance, becomes desperate. Finally he can stand it no longer, and with a drapery wrapped about him, he makes a cyclonic rush for the scene of the party where, in heated terms, he demands of Clifford the return of his trousers.

The scene is then changed, and we see Weary Willie wearing the lost trousers, asleep beneath a tree. He awakens and begins to stretch, and after he has been bothered for a few moments, we see him reach up the leg of the pants and extract a full grown June bug, after which he turns over and continues his dream of the hobos' valahalla.

THE GIRL AND THE BRONCHO BUSTER (July 14).—Ned loves pretty little Jeanette, the winsome young daughter of Bill Murray, a wealthy ranch owner for whom Ned works. The young lover, however, is given to understand, in no uncertain terms, that his attentions to the girl must cease. Father has greater ambitions for his daughter than having her the wife of an impecunious cow puncher.

Just as matters are in this shape, Murray chances to be called away upon a trip, and on the route falls in with a convivial stranger with whom he becomes acquainted. This acquaintance results in a horse trade, whereby Murray becomes the proud owner of a very handsome seal brown mare, which he proudly takes home with him. Arrived home, his new horse is examined by the cow punchers and ranchmen, who inform Murray he has been badly tricked, as the horse that he has purchased has a bad temper and vicious habits and that not one of the men can ride her. His chagrin at having gotten the worst of the deal is intensified by the bitter reproaches of his wife, who upbraids him for what he has done.

Finally Murray becomes so wrathy over the whole matter, that he offers the hand of his daughter to any man who may prove acceptable to the girl, and who will ride the bucking broncho. Ned is on hand, hears the offer, accepts it and undertakes to carry out its conditions by riding the horse.

Then ensues a specimen of broncho busting that perhaps has never been seen in motion pictures. The mare does her very best to throw her rider, but Ned finally conquers the horse and wins the hand of the daughter.

THE CLASS REUNION (July 17).—Professor Burns, an aged instructor, is reduced to poverty, and the story opens at his home, where he is receiving the condolence of his good wife. His book, on which he has been working for months, has been declined by publishers and he is in the throes of despair. He has no money to satisfy the butcher, but, rather than part with one of his books, he endures the pangs of hunger.

Unexpectedly he receives a note from one of his old pupils, inviting him to a banquet in honor of the seven surviving members of the class. He is not inclined to accept the invitation, as he has not the proper clothing, but his wife insists, and from an old trunk resurrects an old-time dress suit and silk hat, and he goes away in high glee.

He meets his old pupils and, after a college yell, they repair to the banquet room. The professor, thinking of his starving wife, deftly secretes articles of food in the folds of his napkin and handkerchief, which he afterwards removes to his pockets, unseen by any of the guests. During the evening the host exhibits a beautiful, unset ruby he has brought from Persia. The bauble is passed around the table for inspection, and is universally admired. It reaches the professor last, and, in passing it back to the host, it falls, unnoticed into a wine glass. The host soon discovers the loss of the stone and institutes a search, to no avail. One of the diners suggests that a search of the guests be made and that all turn their pockets inside out. All do so except the professor. He is embarrassed and, much to the surprise of all, leaves the room and the house.

One of the men follow him out of curiosity. The professor goes directly home, and, without telling his wife what has happened, seats her at a table, takes the food from his pocket and she eats with a relish. The man who has followed, witnesses the scene in amazement. He hastens back to the banquet room and tells his fellow classmates of the poverty of their old preceptor.

During his absence the jewel has been found and his story is listened to with attention. The men at the banquet are all interested. They weight themselves down with baskets of food and pay the professor a visit. They present him with many tokens of their love and respect and, when the old professor breaks down in gratitude, they cover his embarrassment with a series of college yells, given with a will and the old instructor and his wife are happy.

JUST FOR HER (July 20).—Gerald Tompkins and Wilbur Jackson have been friends from youth. They graduate from the same college and are given employment in the same bank. By a strange coincidence, they both love Grace Baldwin and become good-natured rivals. Jackson is the favored one and Tompkins is surprised one day when Jackson announces his engagement to Grace in her presence. Gerald pulls himself together and congratulates them, saddened by the blow.

Time elapses and Gerald accompanies Wilbur home and the happy husband shows him his baby. Gerald takes the child and congratulates the pair.

Jackson lives a fast life—quite beyond his means, and embezzles money from the bank, juggling the figures so as to keep his peculations a secret for a time. At last the officials of the bank become suspicious and meet to examine the books. In the adjoining room Gerald and Wilbur are working. Wilbur is unduly excited and paces the floor. Finally he confesses to his old friend that he has been robbing the bank in a systematic manner for some time and is in despair, saying the exposure will kill his wife. Gerald sympathizes with him and they are both called in to face the bank officials. They are confronted with the charge of stealing money and making false entries in the books. Gerald takes the crime on himself to shield the husband of the woman he has always loved. He is sentenced to a term in the penitentiary, and goes to his incarceration, satisfied that he has spared Grace humiliation.

Wilbur, unable to longer bear the burden, shoots himself and dies, after writing a confession, which finds its way to his wife. Grace is horrified at the disclosure, but immediately sets about to proclaim the innocence of Gerald by informing his parents of the confession. The aged couple visit the governor, and in turn go to the penitentiary, where their son is restored to them, the stigma removed and he accompanies them home, where he is reinstated in his old position in the bank, where he is welcomed with open arms.

Subsequently, Grace visits the bank and is seen by Gerald, through the cage. He puts on his hat and follows her and the story closes with Gerald and Grace married, she happy in the knowledge that her husband has made a great sacrifice for her in attempting to shield her worthless husband.

CHAMPION.

A SOUTHERN GIRL'S HEROISM (July 10).—The Confederate General Pleasanton, is a stern disciplinarian and strong Southern partisan. George Lawrence, though a Southern born, is a Unionist in principal, and dons the Federal uniform, and with it on, calls at the general's house, for he is the sweetheart of the latter's daughter.

Lucy, the sweetheart, strong Southern girl that she is, is shocked at this; but love finally triumphs over loyal sentiment, and she sinks, sobbing on her sweetheart's breast. Just then her father, the general, comes in and discovering the state of affairs, orders George from his house forever.

George goes, but soon he finds his way back to the arms of his beloved one, but unluckily for him, the irate father chances again upon the scene, this time accompanied by some of his officers and soldiers. George has barely time to hide behind a large mirror as the general greets his daughter. The suspense of thes scene may well be imagined, but George is discovered, put under arrest and locked a prisoner in the cellar. He is further humiliated by having a gunny sack tied over his head and shoulders—to remain there until his execution next morning.

That supreme moment arrives, but Lucy is there pleading with her father, who refuses to be swayed from his purpose; but he grants her one request, notwithstanding—the removal of the sack. This done, and lo! and behold! there stands—not George—Oh no—but the negro wench Eliza! The general is, of course, filled with surprise and consternation, though the observer is not, having seen how Lucy and the faithful Eliza a few hours before had accomplished this daring task, thus giving to George his life and liberty.

Although George had himself gallantly saved the general's life, yet that man with adamantine heart is against him. In the early part of the war this took place—George actually nursing him back to life in his own tent. This incident, with many others, to which we can hardly give passing reference, together with George's manly love-making and final triumph, constitutes this film presentation to be one of the very best of its kind.

A DARING DEED (July 19).—The opening scene is a typical Western railroad station, weighing scales, shovel, picks and mining tools generally are scattered around, for this is a mining district. William Carver, as station agent, is there in course of work. Here comes a young bank messenger with bullion, glittering gold dust and nuggets, which Bill marks down casually on the way-bill as though it were sixty cents' worth. But withal, Bill is big and lusty, with iron nerve. Quite different is the next arrival, which is a dead-box, escorted by a quota of mourners, who solemnly give prayer, although they are rough individuals, and they sorrowfully depart.

Before closing the station for the night, Bill wires a good-night message to his little sweetheart, who is the telegraph operator at Silver Springs station. It is well that such is the circumstance, for an unusual thing occurs. We see the lid of the dead-box rise, higher and higher until we look into two baleful eyes. What can this mean? Is it a plot? Bill's eyes open and see what we see! At once his alert mind operates. With a bound he is on the box, depressing the lid, then drags a heavy crate to hold it down, together with every other solid object.

From without come sounds from those erstwhile mourners, who are determined to force an entrance. Bill barricades the entrance, and flies to his faithful ticker—and—click, click goes a message to his sweetheart. At first no response, and untold suspense. She has just arrived and now comes the welcome answer. Leaving her father to continue the conversation over the wire, she mounts her horse and dashes off.

A dance is in progress at Bud's Dance Hall. Right into its midst rides this little heroine. She tells her story, and in a jiffy these rough riders of the plains are off on a mission of succor; and, none too soon do they arrive, for those bold, rough miners have succeeded in breaking down the barricade, and Bill is now engaged in a deadly struggle with them. A shot rings out and one of the assailants is in death's halls. Then the cowboys burst in, and the rest may well be imagined. From out of the box, the now "almost a corpse" is taken and he is marched off with the others. While Bill and his little girl are clasped in love's embrace.

NESTOR.

THE PONY EXPRESS (July 12).—Ever since the Boardman family had arrived, Jack Benton would fairly shout for joy whenever he had a letter for the family, for this meant a few stolen words with the settler's daughter, Polly.

With her brother, Steve, Jack had already made a favorable impression. However, this availed him but little, for old man Boardman wished his daughter to marry a wealthy neighbor, whom he knew as Caleb Simpson, but who, when disguised, was known throughout the State as "Black Bill, the Outlaw."

Quite unwittingly, the highwayman had advanced the young people's romance, by attempting to hold up the Pony Express. A desperate fight had ensued in which Jack had won, but before "Black Bill" had ridden out of sight, the young man sank, exhausted, to the ground. Quickly wheeling his horse, the outlaw started back, when a shot rang out—from, he knew not where—but believing that a rescuing party was near at hand, he once more turned his horse and dashed over the hill.

The shot had been fired by Polly, who from an adjoining peak, had seen the end of the fight. Hurrying to Jack, she found him so slightly wounded, that after she had promised to become his wife, the young man was able to continue his journey.

A few weeks later, "Black Bill" called at the Boardman home, to pay Polly his unwelcome addresses, where he was received with great favor by the elder Boardman, and although snubbed by his son and daughter, the outlaw learned, while there, that Steve would on the morrow, carry quite a sum of money to J. B. Rogers & Co., and that acted as a balm to his wounded feelings.

The next day, carefully disguised, "Black Bill" watched his victim approach, with particular relish, little imagining that from a bend in the road, he too was being watched by Jack Benton,—for the Pony Express was earlier than usual. Dismounting and securing his horse, the young man crawled stealthily forward, until he was within a few feet of the outlaw,—so that Jack's command for the highwayman to throw up his hands, just as he sprang upon Steve, was wholly unexpected, and as a consequence, he was soon securely tied and disarmed.

Their intense surprise at his identity, when they snatched off the disguise, was as nothing, compared to the settler's. A desperado, a highwayman, an outlaw,—and he had tried to force his daughter to marry this man! As the sheriff led his prisoner away, old man Boardman humbly handed his daughter over to Jack, only too grateful that his eyes had been opened in time.

A MATRIMONIAL AFFAIR.—Mutt, limber of mind as well as of body, perceives a little, tantalizing advertisement, sandwiched in the sporting columns of a newspaper: "Man wanted by attractive young widow to manage her $100,000 estate. No objection to poor man." Without much ado, he writes to Rebecca, the attractive young widow. Jeff, whose cerebellum is astonishingly well developed, slowly realizes that something is wrong with his elongated friend. He tries to investigate, but to no avail—Mutt is cautious and the affair is strictly a personal one.

Everything comes to him who waits, even if his name should be Jeff. In fact, the moment Mutt departs to mail his billet deux, the little fellow starts an investigation a la Sherlock Holmes. The tell-tale advertisement is soon subjected to Jeff's careful scrutiny. Manlike, he quickly decides to manage the young widow and her $100,000. Mutt's and Jeff's letters soon meet in the interior of the same mail box and exchange confidences.

In due time, Rebecca receives the notes, and alas! she also notes the address on each of them. "23 Joy Street." "Ah! evidently a joker," thinks the lady. She promptly dispatches a warm invitation to the unknown gallants, arranging, meanwhile with the cook, old Mammy, to meet them.

Mutt, as usual, is the first on the scene, and while enjoying a delightful tete-a-tete with Mammy, Jeff quietly enters, and hides behind an armchair. Though Mammy is disguised under a coat of white paint, she coquettishly holds the fan between her fair visage and Mutt's Cyrano-like nose. Jeff gets somewhat nervous, and slightly moves the chair. Pandemonium breaks loose. Mammy runs out of the room, screaming for help. Rebecca adds her bird-like notes to the tumult, while Mutt is bent on venting his ire upon his unfortunate little partner. They are finally ejected from the premises.

Back in their 2 x 4 hall-room, they gaze at one another's discolored countenance, and with a friendly hand-clasp, they ejaculate, "NEVER AGAIN."

YANKEE.

THE WAY OF THE WORLD (July 17).—Pretty Maggie Dolan had given her final answer to Jim, her childhood sweetheart, that unless he abstained from the use of liquor, she would never marry him.

Jim's faithful promise was soon broken, as he came among a crowd of his boon companions. Upon calling for Maggie that evening at the bank, where she was employed, his free use of the "cup that cheers" was very noticeable. When Maggie refused his escort, he became abusive and received a thrashing at the hands of Tom Bell, the teller of the bank.

When Maggie marries Tom, Jim, contrary to all expectations, becomes a respected citizen and eventually one of the chief detectives on the New York police force.

THE FUNCTION OF DISTRIBUTOR IS ORGANIZATION

After one year's work, careful preparation, careful scrutiny, and thorough analysis of trade conditions, we have achieved an organization. Such an organization as is needed for the proper handling of an exclusive programme. We have our ideas, you have your ideas; but aside from ideas we have the programme, and that programme will be handled exclusively in exclusive territory on exclusive contract basis with the exhibitor. Quality and Variety is the foundation thought in our selection of subjects.

Our representatives have just returned from Europe with exclusive contracts to represent the following European manufacturers:

Mono Film Co., Paris.

After five years, Tom Bell becomes the trusted cashier of his bank, and finally succumbs to temptation. His investments with the bank's capital have been utter failures, and an examination of the books will show his guilt. Filling his grip with all the money he can lay his hands on, he prepares to leave the city. While in hiding, he sends for his wife and baby, and tells them he will soon send for them to join him in some foreign country.

But fate interferes in these well laid plans. While returning to his home, Mrs. Bell and the baby become separated and the baby is found, weeping by Jim O'Neill, now an honored member of the New York detective force. The baby innocently leads the detective to her father's hiding place, and Jim recognizes in the absconding cashier, his successful rival. After securing the grip containing the money, he returns to Tom the revolver he had taken from him. Tom recognizes the significance of the loaded revolver being left to him and pays for the defrication with his life.

Jim brings the baby to her mother and returns the money to the bank, after receiving the assurance of the bank officials to hush the matter up for the sake of the wife and baby.

Two years later, Jim receives his reward by leading to the altar, his childhood sweetheart.

OUTWITTING FATHER (July 21).—When Willie's sweetheart learns that his father had opened her note to Willie making a secret appointment for that evening, and intended to keep the appointment himself, she prepares a little surprise for him.

With the help of a friendly carpenter and his ladder, she releases her sweetheart, who had been locked in his room by his father, and then arranges with a colored girl to dress in her clothes and meet the old gentleman. Unaware of this clever ruse, the old gentleman, having shaved his beard and mustache, and adorned himself in automobile apparel, goes forth to keep the appointment. To his surprise he is met pleasantly by his son's sweetheart, and she permits him to fondle and kiss her. At this moment the sweetheart arrives and the young lady raises her veil and discloses the grinning features of a colored girl.

ECLAIR.

CHARLEY HAS A MANUSCRIPT TO SELL—A COMEDY (July 17).—Charley seems engulfed in a sea of financial difficulties. Creditors are besieging him on every side. In desperation he tries to sell a manuscript if possible.

He calls on a producing manager, but happens in at a time when the latter in in conversation with a young lady, and is promptly ejected for his pains, but not until he manages to take with him a photo of the lady in question, for use later on.

Charley now persists in dogging the manager's every step but with little immediate success except to make said producer's life one of abject misery. As a last resort, Charley threatens to show the young lady's photo to the manager's wife, which brings about an immediate invitation for Charley to read his drama to the manager and his family. Many amusing incidents follow in rapid succession throughout the entire picture.

TEDDY'S THREE DUELS (July 17).—Teddy was born with a strong personality and possessed great personal magnetism. Unconsciously and without effort he acquired the friendship of every man he met, while the gentler sex simply raved over him.

Unlike Don Juan, his intentions were at all times honorable, yet his attractiveness sometimes caused him both mental and physical pain. On one occasion, with which this story deals, a woman of mature years, her pretty daughter and the servant of the house, all chose to fall in love with our gay young Lothario.

Straightway, their respective husbands and sweethearts evinced their displeasure and Charley was the recipient of three unique challenges to as many duels.

Disdaining the use of ancestral weapons, one insisted waging his battle on bicycles, another selected roller skates and the third preferred the water. Just how Teddy behaved under the circumstances, is best told in the film. Suffice it to say, there is a wealth of real comedy throughout the story, and many ludicrous situations are revealed.

GREAT NORTHERN.

A SOLDIER'S LIFE (July 15).—Amusingly depicts the scrapes a man of mature years and large proportions gets into when he enters the army. His awkward manner of drilling soon gets him into trouble with the officers, while his comrades take advantage of his verdant innocence to play all kinds of tricks upon him.

AT SEA UNDER NAVAL COLORS (July 15).—An effective picture of life on a battleship. The tars are seen cleaning the great guns, lowering the boats, etc., and then are put through various exercises and drills with bayonets, cutlasses and the like. At ofttimes the happy soldiers dance and somersault. Finally, we see gunfire practice by several battleships, which conveys a vivid impression of scenes that would occur in a naval war.

REX.

THE VAGABOND (July 13).—George Hopkins, the vagabond, strolls over to the veranda of Editor Lee's home, where the editor and Mrs. Lee and their daughter are having their tea. He glances at the repast with such longing eyes that the editor bids him come nearer. He tells the editor he is hungry, and they offer him a seat and some refreshments. He gets a position as typesetter in Editor Lee's newspaper office, but the foreman continually finds fault with him.

Once, after rather a serious mistake has occurred through the ineptitude of the vagabond, the foreman discharges him. The editor's daughter happens to be in the office at the time and she tries to clear the vagabond, and she bids him good-bye and good cheer, and while her hand is extended the vagabond takes her handkerchief and puts in into his bosom pocket for a keepsake.

He walks down to the general store, where he finds an excited group discussing a notice in the paper against the night riders, who are infesting the district. He asks the store keeper for work, but is refused. One of the group of night riders walks over to him and asks that he join their band. He is told he can avenge himself upon both the editor and the store keeper. The vagabond, with good intentions, decides to join the riders and discover their secrets and hiding places. He is taken to the riders' camp and sworn in as one of them. He is given a horse and that night, with the rest of the band, he rides up to attack the general store keeper. In the confusion, the vagabond finds it possible to slip away and runs off undetected and informs the editor of the coming attack upon his home. He begs Editor Lee to flee, and taking his cap and coat, sits in the editor's chair to await the coming of the desperadoes. They circle the house and through the windows fire at him. Thinking they have shot the editor, they disperse, but the next morning, the household find the body of the faithful vagabond riddled with bullets, and holding in his hand the handkerchief of Miss Lee and the list of names of the night riders.

LUX.

BILL LEARNS TO TAKE CINEMATOGRAPH PICTURES (July 14).—Bill reads an advertisement in the paper, asking for a good operator, to take cinematograph pictures, and promptly applies for the job. His interview with the "producer" is unsatisfactory, for Bill does not display the necessary amount of knowledge, and is requested to learn how to "turn" before he applies again. He wanders off, and seeing a vacuum cleaning machine, commences to turn the handle at a furious rate. He is getting on famously when the arrival of the proper workmen necessitates a hurried exit. He is no more successful when he turns the handle of a hurdy-gurdy, and then seeing a chauffeur furiously struggling with the starting-handle of a motor car, the little comedian "has a go" with the result that the car starts off, and Bill has a perilous journey until he falls off. Believing he has accomplished the task of "turning," he again presents himself at the cinematograph company, and is told to operate during a particularly exciting duel between two comedians. The duel is so realistic that Bill stops turning to admire and applaud, and when the "producer" discovers that the scene is completely wasted, Bill is "run through" with a sword and pinned to a tree, where we leave him.

THE ACCIDENT (July 14).—Mr. Matthews sends his wife and child to the seaside for a short holiday, promising to follow by the next train. On leaving the station, however, he meets an old friend, who persuades him to spend a few hours with him. Meantime, Mrs. Matthews and her little girl are seated in the train, a good scene showing the flying landscape. At the first stop, refreshments are partaken, and the holiday-makers daily over their meal. A few hours later, the newsboys are crying out that a terrible train accident has happened, and Mr. Matthews reads that the train on which his wife and daughter were travelling is wrecked. Excitedly he rushes into the office of the railway company, where a telephone message brings the comforting assurance that all is well, and a happy reunion takes place in the railway station.

KEEP YOUR DRUM HEADS DRY

The very nature of drum heads causes them to absorb moisture readily, and when the heads become damp it is an absolute certainty that your drum will lose its brilliancy.

Our latest invention, the Electric Drum Heater, entirely overcomes this difficulty, for by its use you can keep your drum brilliant and snappy regardless of the weather.

This device can be attached to any drum and the connecting plug will fit any ordinary 110-volt incandescent lamp socket. It gives no light; never burns out; may be turned on and off at will, or if desired, entirely removed in a few seconds time. Entire outfit, including the Heater proper, two connecting plugs, and six feet of cord, weighs eight ounces—the Heater but two. It is practically indestructible and can easily be carried in your drum case.

Be sure and say whether you wish it for Snare Drum, Bass Drum, or Tympani, as each instrument requires a different strength.

Try one—your money back if you are not entirely satisfied

The only alternating current electric fan made that reverses from full speed forward to full speed back—or that can be made to run fast or slow, forward or back.

The only fan that can be instantly changed from an intake to an exhaust fan by the pull of a chain, without eating up current in resistance coils, or some other friend of the meter.

The only fan in which the operating cost decreases in the same ratio in which you decrease its operating speed.

IT IS NOISELESS.
because there is nothing to wear out in it; and that also explains why we can GUARANTEE IT FOR TWO YEARS.

TRADE MARK

THE successful operation of any Motion Picture Machine is contingent upon its being equipped with parts made for that machine; in other words, with genuine parts made by the manufacturer of the original machine. The Edison Projecting Kinetoscope is no exception. The use of counterfeit and spurious parts wears a mechanism quickly, throws it out of adjustment and produces unsteady and unattractive pictures.

Genuine Edison parts are made of the best materials obtainable and are sold at only a fair profit. Each is stamped with our trade-mark, which is your protection. When an exhibitor is offered parts reputed to be genuine, at substantial reductions, it is safe to assume they are counterfeit. We will be glad to be advised of all such cases. Look for the trade-mark on every part you may buy for your Edison Kinetoscope, and thereby insure the proper operation of your machine.

Complete catalogue of parts with established prices mailed upon request.

HOW—IS—BUSINESS?

IT IS GOOD WITH US, AND

IT WOULD BE GOOD WITH YOU

If you would adopt the most modern and up-to-date method of displaying your programs in the lobby of your theatre. There is nothing that is so conducive to getting business as through a good system of advertising. People are attracted to your theatre by the manner in which you display on the outside what you are offering them for their money on the inside and if the front of your theatre is all pasted over with ugly posters, with paste oozing out around the edge of the sheet, the public have the right to expect that your show on the inside will be just as sloppy as the outside, and will consequently look for a place of amusement which is more inviting.

The Fruit of Experience.

Power's No. 6 is not the product of a factory offering its first creation to the public; but is the result of long experience in the construction of moving picture machines and nothing but moving picture machines.

For fourteen years the Nicholas Power Company have been the leading makers of moving picture machines and "Power's No. 6" is the latest and best product of this ripe experience.

It is built to meet every demand of the exhibitor:

It is:

MASSIVE IN DESIGN ACCURATE IN CONSTRUCTION
EASY TO HANDLE COMPLETELY FIREPROOF

and

It will give better service in the hands of the operator than any other picture machine.

We have devised a plan whereby every responsible exhibitor may have his theatre equipped with this matchless machine. Don't wait for cool weather, send for proposition G now.

Another Thanhouser Detective Story

The Smugglers

The Smugglers ←

is a film mystery story of the first class, one that places your bill for the day you run it amongst bills of the first class. So let this be your feature picture that day, especially if it's a very warm day, for the picture is a logical warm weather release with enough breezy seascapes in it to keep it cool. The portrayal of the parts of the pretty smuggler and the detective who trapped her are most realistic; and, indeed, each player in the picture puts over his part in a way that pleases.

No. 229. Code Word, Smug.

A DOLL'S HOUSE

By HENRIK IBSEN

is the answer of the Thanhouser Company to the call of the exhibitors of America for another Ibsen picture, sounded immediately after the release of our first Ibsen reel, "Pillars of Society," a short time ago. The picture carries all the great dramatic qualities that made Ibsen's writings so powerful in play form, and you cannot go wrong if you rig up some special advertising display for this very fine feature. Simply the words "A Doll's House, by Ibsen," will do outside the show, but paint 'em in big letters with the name "Thanhouser" underneath, as a guarantee of merit.

DANTE'S

AN AUTHENTIC INTERPRETATION of the "Divinna Commedia" better known to the American people as Dante's Inferno, by the MILANO FILMS CO.

A moving picture translation of the Italian Literary Immortality, correctly rendered by Italian Artists and Artisans, thus preserving all the true essence and spirit of the original.

The pictured story of a trip through Hades.

The poet Dante, under the guidance of the poet Virgil, is taken through the Infernal Regions where the souls of departed men, women and children languish amid the fire and brimstone, seared and suffering for sordid sins.

The great possibilities for wonderful scenic effects have been taken advantage of. The acting has been done by the greatest of Italian players, thoroughly imbued with the spirit and understanding of the work.

The result of two years great labor and expense. In five reels.

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS

There is in the City of New York a certain coterie that has been trading for years on other people's advertising. They lay in wait for announcements of great special films, and immediately set about preparing an imitation. For the benefit of that crowd we wish to quote the following from Sec. 28 of the Copyright act of Mar. 4, 1909:

"Sec. 28. That any person who wilfully and for profit shall infringe any copyright secured by this act, or who shall knowingly and wilfully aid or abet such infringement, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by IMPRISONMENT." Note that last word.

We hold the copyright and the American rights for this film.

LOOK OUT FOR IMITATIONS MILANO LOOK OUT FOR IMITATIONS

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS!

NOTICE—Every great and successful Moving Picture has its imitations.

The original Passion Play was pirated in a pitiful way by a coterie of film fakers.

The Jeffries-Johnson fight was ridiculously faked by a parasitical crowd whose principal asset was unlimited nerve.

It is probable that a group of lightweights are now making all speed to foist upon the trade and the public a fake production of the genuine DANTE'S INFERNO by the MILANO FILMS CO.

If they do so it will be a hurried imitation of the authentic Dante, which has been endorsed by the Italian press and applauded by the King of Italy, and for which we hold the American rights.

Exhibitors and Exchangemen, do not be deceived. Watch our advertisements each week and we will keep you posted.

To imitators—we request that they read Section 28 of the Copyright Act of Mar. 4, 1909, which makes infringement punishable, not only by fine, but by IMPRISONMENT.

The Indian Brothers

The Story of an Indian's Honor

A renegade Indian seeks admission into the tribe, and the chief in scorn offers him a squaw's dress, which means at the same time an insult and a denial of his request. The renegade for revenge slays the chief, who, through illness, is unable to defend himself. The renegade escapes and some of the tribe signal distress to the brother of the slain chief, who is out on a hunting trip. The brother returning to the camp, swears over the body of the chief to bring the perpetrator of this crime back and to justice. On his way the renegade steals a horse, and for this is pursued by another tribe of redmen, who catch him just as the brother comes up. The chief's brother claims the culprit, and offers to fight for him. He wins and the renegade misconstruing his act, is profuse in his thanks for his rescue, but it is not long before he realizes why he was rescued, for when taken back to the funeral pile of the chief, he pays the penalty.

Facts and Comments

It appears that in Chicago a society was recently formed for the avowed purpose of uplifting the stage. "The Theatre Society," as it is called, designs "to give the public the kind of drama it wants," instead of the kind it gets "under the false managerial estimate of its intelligence." A daily paper of this city, commenting upon this fact, remarks:

"The fact that organized effort is necessary to provide theater-goers with the best drama casts a curious reflection on the business acumen of managers. The public has a greater liking for good dramatic work than it is credited with. Plays which have substance or which skilfully delineate character enjoy the longest runs. Less worthy managerial offerings purposely designed to meet a fancied demand are accepted on sufferance."

The marvelous growth and popularity of the moving picture is in some measure due to the unfortunate managerial guesses as to public taste just mentioned. The moving picture, of course, was bound in any event to win its way to recognition, but it cannot be denied that the managers and the men higher up in the theatrical business involuntarily, but none the less effectively, contributed their share. The men who control the theatrical situation in this country today have the privilege of estimating the public taste and demands, and the public has the privilege of rejecting these estimates and following its own independent judgment. Of the two privileges it seems to us that the latter is more truly a privilege, because its exercise entails no possible loss on the public, while the managerial privilege is likely to be heavily penalized every time it goes wrong.

The public is heartily tired of traveling all the way stations between insipid and indecent "musical comedy" and the "problem play." The fond belief of the powers that be in the theatrical world that with money and organization on their side they do not have to take particular pains about pleasing or gauging the public taste, has cost them a good bit of money. If they will only profit by their experience, the money may not have been spent altogether in vain, but signs do not point that way. Instead of improving their attractions as the film-makers have done, they consume their time in idle schemes to "beat" the pictures.

There is a note of warning in this situation to the moving picture people as well, especially to the exhibitors and the film-makers. Put in the tersest form, it reads: "Beware of managerial estimates." There is great danger of assuming an infallibility in judging of what the public demands. In a measure, of course, we are all guessing, but on the whole it will be found that a maintenance of the higher ideals, for which this paper has always pleaded, is a safe course to pursue. We have repeatedly pointed out a litany of "Don'ts," and judging by results, our work has borne fruit. Many of the objections against moving pictures have in this way been eliminated, to the benefit of everybody.

A short while ago, a thatrical combination, thoroughly convinced that the masses of the great cities must have melodrama in its most antiquated and stereotyped form, set out to obtain control of a number of theatres to "give the people what they wanted." Tons of lurid lithographic literature were spread over millions of feet of advertising space, the press agents where whipped and spurred to unusual activities, old melodramatic hacks and young melodramatic aspirants were hired by the score, and then the great combination sat back to watch developments. These proved to be of a strictly negative character.

Some of the men in this scheme were old, experienced managers and showmen, who would have scorned with their own peculiar ineffable conceit the idea that the people had learned and that their taste had changed for the better. They themselves had failed to discern the signs of the times, and paid for it with new and costly experience. No one is infallible in predicting the success or failure of theatrical or moving picture ventures, but every one with eyes to read ought to be able to note the great progress among the masses of the people.

In the olden days in Scotland, when witch-hunting was at its height, the courts throughout that kingdom appointed a set of "witchfinders," whose duty it was to stir up things generally, and by scenting out a sufficiency of witches to keep business active for the judges and executioners. If things were running along smoothly and people lived in neighborly amity, observing the golden rule, the "witchfinders" had hard times, but whenever jealousy, envy, suspicion, hatred, superstition or evil gossip were abroad, the "witchfinders" were busy morning, noon and night.

Witchfinders by that name are extinct, but the breed out of which they were recruited is with us still, hardy and vigorous, as so many evil breeds seem to be. Today we know them as "reformers," "crusaders," "agitators," "moralists." They are found in high places as well as in low, and abound in city as well as in country. Thoroughly persuaded of their own superlative goodness, they see nothing but evil in others. They are experts in "denouncing," "scoring," "flaying." Not so long ago the moving picture was their particular aversion, and in some sections of the country their Quixotic folly in this matter is still in evidence. In general, however, they are letting the moving pictures alone now, finding them well-entrenched in popular favor. The assault of the "witchfinders" was to be expected; it has really done little harm, and often has been the cause of the moving picture finding friends in unexpected quarters. Many good people who, at the behest of the witchfinders, came into the moving picture theatre to censure and condemn, remained to admire and praise.

It will be the duty of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD hereafter to record more frequently and at some length the film activities in the scientific world. Anything which raises the public estimation of the moving picture and enhances its dignity is of distinct and immediate benefit to the exhibitors everywhere. Hundreds, perhaps thousands, of professional men, who know but little of the moving picture and are wholly indifferent, will, through its use in the realms of science, become interested in moving pictures generally, will see with delight and wonder the great height to which the picture, even when regarded as simply an amusement, has risen, and will become its active friends and defenders. The influence of such men is worth much in every community.

This influence will be especially useful to the exhibitor and the industry at large in the matter of legislation. The ignorance even among men of affairs on the subject of moving pictures is at times astounding, and as a result some very absurd and pernicious statutes are enacted in every State of the union. Much of this legislation could have been prevented by an enlightened and organized effort on the part of exhibitors. The practise of hiring a lawyer and having him address the committee to which any particular piece of legislation has been referred, is not always to be commended. It is but rarely effective. The exhibitors must appeal to public opinion, and where public opinion is wrong—as it often is—it must be set right by a campaign of education. In such a campaign the man of affairs, the scholar and the scientist are powers for good, and it means much to the exhibitor to have them enlisted on his side.

A few days ago a Roman Catholic priest of some note in his diocese called upon the manager of a moving picture theatre to make arrangements for the hiring of the hall. Before the priest left the theatre he accepted the manager's invitation to look at the pictures. The first picture the priest saw was "The Life of a Nun." A young girl is made to enter the convent against her will, and for breaking a crucifix in a fit of anger is condemned to be immured alive. The picture shows the nuns getting ready to wall up the young lady, when the lover arrives and there is a rescue. According to newspaper reports the priest took great offence at the film, and rising up among the audience denounced the exhibition in scathing terms. It seems to us that the priest was clearly within his rights in objecting to the picture, even though such or similar cruelties may have at times happened in nuneries. The moving picture should be most tolerant of all religions and never offend the feelings or wound the prejudices of any sect whether Christian, Jewish, Mohammedan, Buddhists, Fireworshippers, etc. It is a modern invention and should be entirely free from any taint of medieval bigotry or fanaticism.

The occurrence, duly exaggerated by the yellow press, is doubly regrettable, because it could have been avoided by the exercise of the least business judgment. The Moving Picture World had given ample notice of the offensive character of the film. The exhibitor in the case is quoted as saying that he "did not even know what his pictures were until they were thrown upon the screen." We readily believe it, otherwise he would not have invited the priest to witness his show that particular night. Why did he not acquaint himself with his program? No exhibitor can have any valid excuse for failure in this matter. By far the great majority of exhibitors pay great attention to their programs, and we know of hundreds of conscientious exhibitors who have returned or refused to use objectionable reels at the risk of loss and inconvenience. Better by far to lose a little than to provoke the great evil which results from the exhibition of a film excepted to on the grounds of decency or religious prejudice. The exhibitor sought to relieve himself of responsibility by referring to the fact that the film had been passed by the Board of Censors. The exhibitor himself is the final censor in every case, although this particular film should never have been passed by the censors. It seems fair that some allowance should be made by exchange or manufacturer, where an exhibitor returns such a reel as the one in question. Some latitude should be allowed to the exhibitor in such matters, for he best understands the character of his audience, their feelings and prejudices, their likes and dislikes.

One of the encouraging things about present conditions in the industry is the willingness and even anxiety of the film makers in all camps to aid the exhibitor. Recently a licensed film maker sent out special music with a feature reel and it was much appreciated by the exhibitors. Now an Independent concern has followed suit and has endeavored to help the exhibitors in a proper and successful presentation of one of its films. Mutual helpfulness, evidences of good will and harmony, a realization, that co-operation is the order of the modern day are certainly pleasant signs on the horizon of the moving picture sky. It is only fair to emphasize the fact, that such intelligent solicitude on the part of the film maker begets a sort of moral responsibility on the part of the exhibitor to follow the pace set by the makers and to fall in with their suggestions. What vicious results may follow from a failure of the exhibitor to co-operate intelligently is pointed out at some length in the article "A Waste and a Danger," on page 105 of this issue, which is recommended for general perusal.

The Legislature of the State of New York, which for the first time in more than fifty years is still in session in midsummer, has aimed what is known as "strike legislation," aimed at moving picture men and moving picture theatres. Happily the legislative calendars are so badly clogged that comparatively few bills out of the mass introduced reach the Governor, and the proposed moving picture legislation shared the fate of these other lost bills. One bill proposed the compulsory use of a certain magazine of moving picture machines, and the other proposed legislation was much of the same type. We hope the exhibitors will next year be in a position to combat all hostile legislation and make it die in the committees.

Dante's Inferno, (Milano Films Company)

Shown at Private Exhibition.

Before an audience of invited guests Dante's Inferno, as filmed in five reels by the Milano Films Company, was shown in the office of the Monopol Film Company, No. 145 West 45th Street, New York City. The production fully justified the enthusiastic praise of the Italian and European press, to which reference was made in a recent issue of the Moving Picture World. Beyond a doubt this film is the non plus ultra of the moving picture art. The Moving Picture World will devote suitable space in an early number to an exhaustive review of this unparalleled production which will not only be popular wherever shown but will continue to be a classic for years to come.

The Royal Theater Company, of Marion, Ind., issues a 20-page leaflet program that is a bit unusual for a picture theater in point of size and excellence. It is of convenient size and brim full of interesting information about the pictures. The front cover page is adorned by a half-tone engraving of Mr. William Garwood, leading man of the Thanhouser Company. There is a liberal sprinkling of advertisements, which indicates that the Royal people are in good favor locally. Dolly Spurr is the very competent editor of this little paper, which is called "Royal Reports."

Baltimore Censorship Flurry

Something seems to be wrong with the reformers of Baltimore. Recently there has been a storm of protest against the evil motion pictures. Letters have been written to the papers until they became tiresome to the point of nausea. Weeping mothers, irate parents, affronted old maids and childless but careful bachelors have all contributed to the literature of the subject and all were agreed that the deadly motion picture was destroying the youth of the land. Even the Chief of Police, a level-headed person, had to sit up and take notice after a while when harassed editors sought to shift the responsibility and put the matter up to him. With the wisdom of a Solomon he assented to the censorship and named every inhabitant of the city on the censorship board. All any person had to do was to write, wire or call in person with the report of an immoral or otherwise offensive film and his sleuths would go get the film and the man who was showing it. An extra telephone operator was put on at headquarters in anticipation of a rush, but his position has proved to be a sinecure. There has been no complaint registered from any member of the Baltimore Board of Censorship; no word by voice or wire, and the reporters have to write their own "Letters to the Editor" to fill the "Voice of the People" columns. Can it be that the objectors merely liked to see their names in print? Is it possible that the reformers have been kidding the papers? Or is it that the protest was not based upon fact and the objectors are unable to cite concrete instances of the alleged immorality? We hold to the opinion that the reformers dealt in the product designated as oxalene, but then a reformer should not be held down to facts, especially when it comes to criticising and reforming motion pictures.

Mistakes Will Sometimes Happen

We are compelled to chide the Washington Post. We dislike to criticize our contemporaries, but in the language of the day the Post is not onto its job. It violates tradition; it introduces innovations and turns its back boldly upon one of the sacred precedents of the city room, one of the cherished devices of the telegraph editor. The world of journalism stands aghast and we join the mighty chorus of protest. The other day there was a fire in a picture theater in Annapolis. Perhaps the operator trod on a match; perhaps a fuse blew, but at any rate there was a puff of smoke that in the case of a picture show becomes a flagration if there is flame enough to become visible to a short-sighted man standing at a distance of seven feet. News of the happening was telegraphed the Post and the item was headed "Theater Fire Fails to Alarm Audience." Nothing about the terrible panic, no hints of a heavy loss of life, no suggestion that frenzied mothers thronged about the entrance waiting for their offspring to be brought out. Just a simple record of the fact that there had been a blaze that had caused some slight damage "while the house was crowded, but the audience passed out quietly without a trace of excitement." What if they did? Other audiences have passed out quietly only to read the next morning that they fought each other to escape incineration, trampling down women and children in the mad rush for the doors. Other audiences have gone away quickly and in good order only to find in the morning paper that scores were injured. Was the Post story written by a cub reporter without imagination or can it be possible that one paper has decided to tell the truth about photoplay theaters even at the risk of upsetting the entire journalistic structure? The latter seems too good to be true. It must have been the cub.

Another Step Forward

We are quite used to seeing actors and actresses of more than national renown take leading parts in photoplays of French origin, but in this country the great stars have so far not been seen in moving picture productions, excepting perhaps Cecil Spooner, who did such fine work in Mark Twain's "The Prince and the Pauper," filmed by the Edison Company. A distinct step forward in this direction has now been taken by the always enterprising Kalem Company. This company has purchased a motion picture scenario adapted from Sidney Drew's well-known farce, "When Two Hearts Are Won." Mr. Drew, who is a distinguished member of the famous talented theatrical family of that name, will personally direct the production and himself appear in the leading part. "When Two Hearts Are Won" has been played in every English-speaking country and has achieved considerable fame both for itself and for Mr. Drew. The play has had a six months' run at one of the London theatres, and is today justly considered one of the best legitimate farces ever produced. For furnishing to the patrons of the moving picture such high-class comedy the Kalem people deserve great credit. It is a new departure, and a departure in the right direction. It proves, as nothing else could, the refinement of taste among moving picture audiences and the disappearance of the broad, coarse, vulgar "comics" and tiresome "chases," which at one time were by the public believed to be inseparable from the moving picture. There is no doubt that audiences everywhere will enjoy this farce and carry away a new idea of the possibilities of the photoplay.

Fools Rush In

It appears to be the curse of the photoplay theater that this form of amusement enterprise is regarded as a branch in which no person can fail to make a profit. The time has been, and it is not very far back in the past, when almost any store could be fitted over into a picture show and return the original investment within a few weeks or at most a few months. Then the novelty of the idea won quick patronage and the business was still so new that there was little congestion and competition. But although this condition has passed the idea still remains and investors are convinced that the surest get-rich-quick scheme is to open a picture show. With no qualifications as manager, the enterprise is started and as soon as the dooors are thrown open the investor looks for a quick return in profits. They may come for a time, but success is not to be lasting unless intelligent managerial methods are employed. Meanwhile the novice is perpetrating all sorts of blunders, some of them far reaching errors that affect other houses than his own, and at last, when he retires or sells out it is the others who pay the price of his folly. Even among those who might be expected to know better the tales of fabulous profits to be derived from pictures is accepted as a fact and so shrewd an operator as A. L. Erlanger listened to the wiles of the tempter and backed a picture show that provided him with a neat statement of losses each week. There is money to be made in pictures; as much to-day as there ever was, but the price of success is greater, for there is now demanded intelligent management, good taste in the handling of the program, the house itself must be other than a makeshift and the management must be watchful every moment of the time. There are "all sorts of money" in the pictures, but some sorts are counterfeit to match the management. The application of common sense and ordinary business judgment will be found quite as necessary in this form of amusement enterprise as in any other.

The Compelling Harmony of the Whole

By W. Stephen Bush.

Consciously or unconsciously every person looking at a moving picture applies the same test as to its excellence. The critical faculty, which in varying degrees is present in every human mind, looks for the harmony of the whole or, to use a phrase in more common use, the unity of design. To the extent to which the parts of a picture are coherent with and subordinated to one central idea, the picture is good. The very moment any of the parts show a centrifugal tendency, or in other words drifts ever so slightly away from the central governing idea, the picture deteriorates. There is no realm of art to which the same rule does not apply. The painting, the statue, the work of the architect must abide by this supreme test, but nowhere is the criterion more inexorable than in the drama. A clever mise-en-scene, good actors, perfect scenic arrangements, are highly desirable, but utterly insufficient in themselves to make a perfect drama. You and I have wondered at the rude, bare boards of Shakespeare's theatre, at its lack of all those outward helps that today are deemed so necessary. Do you believe that an age like that of James I, so rich in learning, so clever in contriving, could not have supplied the modern accessories of stage play? They were unknown, because not needed. The audience was held by the play itself, and the play had power to hold the audience because it fully answered this supreme test—one central governing thought or idea gripped the mind of the spectator at the start and held it in firmest thrall to the end. Take "Hamlet" or "Macbeth" or "Othello." Not a line but works up to the harmony of the whole. Not a chord is touched anywhere, except as it is intended to swell the great theme of the play. The central idea of "Macbeth" is like all great and controlling ideas in the drama, exceedingly simple—the overwhelming of man by destiny. The first scene plants the seed of the idea in the spectator's mind: we see weird, mystic, irresponsible powers at work, strange forces that help to weave the threads in the web of fate. "Honest in trifles to betray in deepest consequence." The second chord is touched when the invincible powers of evil make the Lady Macbeth their ally; then comes the visit of the King to the castle, the fearful temptation of Macbeth, the taking of the bait of Fate, the crown, and the destruction of Macbeth and the final triumph of destiny. The dramatic art is the subtlest of telepathies. The spectator is moved, then absorbed, and must, when the great play is over, make an effort to shake the hypnosis from his being. The one central idea does it all. In ancient Greece, where audiences of ten and twenty thousand were not unusual, when the dramatic instinct was more highly developed than it has ever been before or since, when criticism was pitiless and would tolerate nothing but the best, the vast auditorium was often in the midst of some great tragedy, hushed in profoundest silence for an hour, until the tension broke at last and the murmuring of twenty thousand voices paid tribute to the power of a central idea over the spectator's mind. The Greek drama conformed absolutely to this compelling harmony of the whole.

Like Shakespeare's plays, the Attic drama derived its tremendous power from the unity of design—take any of its parts, they meant nothing and were nothing but beautiful fragments, beautiful to be sure, but still only fragments; but join them together and the harmony represented in the whole was exquisite beyond the power of words. Each broken piece of a vase has a charm, but the whole vase alone is the true expression of the creative mind.

In the silent drama the absolute dominance of the one central governing idea is the conditio sine qua non—the very life blood of the production. Men are so constituted that they understand each other only with the greatest difficulty. When you want to convey an idea to a great number of people you must be plain, clear and simple. If you concentrate your work on one idea, thoroughly absorb it into your own mind and then by a process of elimination cast away all non-essentials in its expression to others, the chances favor your success. Build on a broad foundation, rise step by step and then prepare your climax. Waste nothing, be chary of motion, give enough to show the idea and no more, for nothing will more surely defeat success than overexertion. Use your stage as the potter uses the clay, use it to work out your conception; let the stage be the means and your idea the end. Unity of design does not mean narrowness. Play out your strings as far as you like, dear builder of dramas, the earth is yours and the fullness thereof, but let no thread get out of your hands for a second, and never remove your eye from the one design of the whole. Your audience will let you play at will in the early part of your drama, but it has but little patience, and unless in the second act your idea begins to take visible shape, unless you have charmed some outlines onto the airy nothing of the white canvas, the fatal question is sure to be asked: "What does it mean?" "What is it all about?" The interest begins to lag, when it should be keenest, curiosity tires and dies, and the picture is rejected. Grasp, therefore, your one compelling idea with hooks of steel and let nothing tempt you to wander into bypaths.

I have been moved to these sundry and various remarks because of the recent repeated attempts on the part of many makers to string together a number of pretty, natural-looking, well-staged and well-photographed scenes with the loosest kind of a bond of action and call them photoplays. Such are photographs, but not photoplays. Two or three good actors, good photography, clever staging, do not and never will constitute a play. A capable actor or actress to keep up his or her measure of success must be fed with good parts and new ideas. There is a charm in the very presence and manner of some stage-folk; many of us delight even in the simple spectacle of their walking across the stage or smiling at the audience. This charm, however, soon loses its potency if there is no inspiring purpose in the actor's work. Sometimes an actor has been the end and the drama the means, but this is not as it should be and wholly exceptional and destructive of true dramatic art. The true artist sinks his personality in his part, the matinee idol, to the great mass of the public which pays the bill, soon becomes a nuisance. Lifelike scenes rouse but little interest if not closely connected with the governing idea of a play; splendid scenery in a drama only serves a purpose when it fits into the harmony of the whole or makes the right sort of frame; in itself it is nothing but a reproduction, which today requires but a modicum of skill. Clever photography is a great desideratum, but there must be something to photograph, and a stupid play cannot be improved by good photography, though some manufacturers seem to think so. It is the spirit that quickeneth, the breath of life that is blown into the play, the one governing compelling idea that holds and rivets the attention and arouses the sentiments of the spectator. Where this is wanting all labor is in vain; where it is present the simplest becomes the most effective. Attempt no production of a photoplay until idea and purpose are clear in your mind, even as the picture of the great cathedral must be revealed to the mind of the architect before he asks the masons to begin their work. Good acting is needful, good staging is indispensable, good photography is a delight, every proper technical equipment helps—but "the play's the thing."

An Interview With Thomas A. Edison.

By Frank Parker Hulette.

At a recent convention of the National Electric Light Association, held in this city, Mr. Edison was the most honored and distinguished guest. A representative of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD had the good fortune to see Mr. Edison and obtain from him a few remarks and observations about electricity and moving pictures. The modesty of this greatest of all American and modern inventors is well known as is his reluctance to speak of himself or his achievements. The American public in general and the various industries to which his inventions have given rise in particular, are always intensely interested in any thing that comes from Mr. Edison and we of the moving picture field are thankful for any of his utterances on cinematography.

Thomas A Edison

Speaking to our representative on the subject of electricity, Mr. Edison remarked: "I do not know the A B C of the alphabet of the natural force, which we call electricity. I have discovered, developed and applied certain laws, producing certain demonstrable results, which can be commercially utilized, but I am even as a child in the knowledge of a force, that so far as I can see or learn has neither boundary nor limitation."

On the subject of moving pictures Mr. Edison said: "The moving picture has come to stay. In the parlor it will occupy a companion place with the piano and the phonograph. Guests as they now bring their newest phonographic records for an evening's enjoyment will bring their latest reel or film. Amateur photographers will make motion pictures of the interesting features of their travels in America and Europe or the Orient. Brides and their grooms will with pride show to their friends the features of their honeymoon trip by moving picture photographs, and even by that wizard camera, depict for future generations on the film the early attempts at pedestrianism of their first-born. In the church the story of the Saviour and the scenes in Palestine so familiar with His footsteps as it is to-day will be shown by a moving picture machine to congregation and to Sunday-school. In the public schools more accurate knowledge of geography, manufactures, productions, and peoples, with their habits of life and activities will, as no other agency can, impress themselves on the minds of the young pupils.

"I can teach more accurate geography in half an hour to a class of young pupils by moving pictures than a pedagogue can in a month.

"Not only will the future development of moving pictures entertain the family party, instruct the religious, and impart knowledge of distant lands, customs and peoples with their resources to the student, but also it will be prominent in future politics.

"In place of the 'spellbinder' with his stereotyped and now stale plea for 'the Old Flag and an Appropriation' and his customary prayer to 'save the country' from the opposition party just once more! there will be motion pictures showing commercial and industrial conditions abroad, illustrating the homes of employers and employees, their employment, their clothing, their comforts, their food, their amusements, their duties, their burdens and their taxes, as well as their educational facilities, their moral enlightenment and their wage-earning capacity. These moving pictures of actual life in the different nations will instruct the native American and bring with it a connective force which will also educate the stranger within our gates in a manner which no platform eloquence nor spellbinding buncombe can rival."

"There is one more thing that should be taken into account," said this Good Gray Philosopher Edison. "Remember the eighteen to thirty thousand foreigners without knowledge of the English language, which monthly are dumped by the steamships in New York port alone. Their purses do not warrant them in visiting the Broadway attractions a two dollars a throw, and the dialogue of the plays would be unintelligible to them if they spent the money. These people must have their pastimes, they must have entertainment and amusement. The popular-priced moving picture shows furnishes this. They can understand the motion picture tragedy, the motion picture drama, the motion picture comedy!"

"The moving picture art will largely supplement the art of printing for the transmission and diffusion of knowledge. It will be used for teaching many of the elementary subjects. What child, for example, has a very well defined idea of a foreign country or people merely by reading about them? A printed description is obviously incomplete, and mental pictures are formed that are generally incorrect. For a child, reading and study are generally irksome. Now, if geography were taught by moving pictures, if foreign lands and cities were illustrated, if the topography and general characteristics were shown, if the habits and demeanor of the people were depicted, and if their occupations and methods of work and recreations were illustrated, the child would have almost as clear an idea of everything as if the original scenes were viewed directly; and not only so, but the study of geography would be a tremendously interesting experience, and not a hardship, as is now likely to be the case.

"The study of history will also be made easy and interesting by pictures of great events In the study of literature the moving picture will also play an important part, because the books and poems of the great writers can be illustrated as actual incidents, and not be confined to cold type.

"In fact, for educational purposes, the field is without limit, and pictures, for example, have actually been taken illustrating chemical reactions. When I was a boy one of my greatest delights was the study of experiments of Sir Humphrey David. What would I not have given if that work had been brought to my attention as a reproduction of the original experiments of the great scientist! When so abtruse a subject as chemistry can find an opportunity for enlightenment in moving pictures, I think that specialists in other branches will have no difficulty in utilizing them effectively for their own work. Above all else, the fact must not be lost sight of that for educational purposes the moving picture possesses the tremendous advantage of not only giving a more correct and vivid idea of a subject than can possibly be obtained in books, but it places the knowledge before the child in an attractive and entertaining way. Instead of 'the whining schoolboy creeping like a snail unwillingly to school,' I shall not be surprised to see the school children of the future clustered on the steps waiting for the door to open."

The police of Berlin recently made an ordinance absolutely prohibiting the attendance at moving picture theaters of children under 14 years of age after 9 p. m., whether accompanied by parents and guardians or not. The exhibitors made a test case in the courts, with the result that the contention of the police has been sustained.

A French trade journal says that old films are used in France for producing a special gloss on patent leather shoes. It states that there is a chemical process of treating the celluloid and making it useful in the manner mentioned.

Through the recent confiscation and secularization of churches in France many of the chapels and churches have been converted into moving picture theaters. A well-known church back of the Pantheon in Paris has undergone such a change, a fact which was recently alluded to by a famous French journalist.

A Waste and A Danger

W. Stephen Bush.

A house divided against itself cannot stand; no more can a theatre. It cannot, to paraphrase Lincoln, endure permanently, half pictures and half vaudeville. It will be either all vaudeville or all pictures. Go with me into any theatre in this broad land where this division exists and a little observation will tell that it is either on the road to pictures or on the road to vaudeville; or, if the experiment has lasted long enough, more probably on the road to ruin.

When in one of the Keith & Proctor houses of this city the management, having the two reels of "Faust" in the operator's booth, deliberately "sandwiches" between the first and second reel two acts of ghastly vaudeville, every exhibitor of intelligence can draw his own conclusion as to the probable final outcome. How can we expect the public to take the moving picture seriously, to believe in the uplift of the great art, if we treat a two-reel subject of the merit of "Faust" in such butcherly fashion? If such a theatre would hurt only its own box office or its own reputation by such methods a friendly word of warning would measure the extent of our journalistic responsibility in the matter.

Unfortunately the effects of such ignorance or unconscious hostility to the moving picture reach much further. They are sure to breed a contempt for it, which will be contagious. Just think of it: a classic work, for which the film-maker provided a special musical programme; for which this paper printed a special lecture; on which were spent thousands of dollars, great skill and pains, experience and time, "chased" through the machine and broken into by two cheap acts of the lowest form of human amusement. At the end of the first reel the audience is charmed and fascinated; it has seen great artists act, it has been delighted with superb settings, it has watched the unfolding of the immortal story to the point of absorption, and then, instead of the second reel it gets "Blank and Jones, the Musical Tramps," and after they have appeared and (thank God) disappeared, follow "Bill and Jim, the Comical Jugglers," and then—the second reel of "Faust." Why not trained dogs between the reels of the Passion Play?

If a large and growing portion of the public is today more favorably disposed toward the moving picture and believes in its higher mission, it is in spite of such methods on the part of the vaudeville theatres. It shows the vitality of the great art, which has power to combat and conquer even such stupidity. Not only do such methods impede the progress of the photoplay in the estimation of the public, but they injure directly and materially the manufacturers of high-class films. If the latter are fed to the public like swill to swine, thrown at them in contempt and ignorance, the demand for this class of films will not increase as it naturally would, and cheaper pictures will again hold sway. The public will become disgusted and enter into judgment with the film-maker and say: "If you cannot improve and rise, then it is best for you to go out of business." The manufacturers will consult not only the welfare of the industry but their own dearest interests by watching the treatment of great films in vaudeville houses and refusing to supply such theatres that, wilfully or otherwise, degrade the picture with the probable ulterior motive of creating popular disgust and a general reaction against the moving picture entertainment. It would have been better to throw the two reels into the flames than to make them objects of ridicule before twelve hundred people. While every other film shown in the house that afternoon was applauded, more or less, "Faust," incomparably the finest number on the programme, was received in cold silence.

Reviews of Notable Films

"HER DAD, THE CONSTABLE."

A "Classy" Comedy by Essanay.

The Essanay Company has a really delightful film subject in store, the release date being July 18. It is a "classy," well acted comedy by the Eastern company, under the direction of Producer R. E. Baker. Its title is "Her Dad, the Constable."

Most of the scenes are out-of-doors, and the love-making is all conducted out-of-doors—in a nice, poetic, refined way that puts lingering in the sitting-room until the midnight hour away farther in the shade. Thanks to F. X. Bushman and

Scene from the Essanay Comedy, "Her Dad the Constable."

Dorothy Phillips, who represent the happy pair in the story, we are given a valuable lesson in the art of making love without indulging in uncouth "bear" methods. The languishing look, dipped in soul fire, and the beatific smile, tinted with heart rapture, impress us even more effectively than would the "head-on-the-manly-bosom" act and the bearish embrace that forces from us a sympathetic yowl for fragile ribs. Yes, the love-making in "Her Dad, the Constable" is decidedly "classy," and the rough spots over which the hero is obliged to travel, though they awaken sympathy for that nice young man, will force peals of silvery laughter—"silvery," mind you, not the raucous Haw! Haw! of the vulgar.

The settings of the comedy reveal metropolitan and rural scenes, the types of character being chiefly of the country. The old village constable, father of the bride, is excellently portrayed by Harry Cashman, whose make-up and conception of the part will appeal to everyone. All the other Jakes and Joans of the village are well costumed and capably acted.

The photography throughout will bear careful scrutiny. In some places, in the automobile race made by the groom to reach his bride at the hour set for the wedding ceremony, it may appear that there are several unusually long waits, but these are due to the fact that F. X. Bushman cannot drive an auto, although the hero is supposed to, in the story, and a chauffeur is operating the machine, but always kept out of sight in the pictures.

THE PIED PIPER OF HAMELN (Thanhouser).

The well-known mediæval legend, celebrated again and again in poetry and music, has fared very well at the hands of the film-maker. The gruesome feature of the legend has always been the punishment of the children whom the piper led away into the water, where they drowned or hid in caves and regions unknown.

The deft touch of some gifted hand has wrought a most satisfying change in the old story. The faithless burghers, who would not pay the Piper, are justly made to suffer by being deprived of their children, but the children themselves are having "the time of their lives" with the Piper, who in the film is a very decent chap indeed. If he does lure the little ones into a cave, he regales them with stories and teaches them all sorts of games and sports and leaves them no time to be homesick. The same clever hand which made this most welcome change in the old story, has directed the production from beginning to end and has given the exhibitors a film for which they will, without exception, be duly thankful. A loving interest in the picture, a minute and artistic attention to all details, a full grasp of the spirit of the legend are apparent throughout. The costumes and settings brought us back to the old town of Hameln in the year of about 1300 A. D. The chief charm of the story is of course to be found in the children, and no one has realized this better and more fruitfully than the producer of the film. Great pains no doubt were taken with the children, for they went through their arduous tasks with understanding and enthusiasm. The outdoor scenes, the wanderings of the children, following the piping lure, the arrival at the entrance to the cave, the passing in of the gay little procession formed a series of pictures that were a constant delight to the eye. The little fellow that played the part of Lame Tim is a winner of hearts. Not a bit of self-consciousness, sweet, natural, full of genuine feeling, he is capable of throwing a gentle spell over any audience. The street scenes were well rendered. The whole production was singularly free from blemishes of any kind. One cannot help wishing that there ought to be more of such reels. The Pied Piper of Hameln is a star in any program.

Chicago Letter.

By James S. McQuade.

The oppressively hot spell that has prevailed in Chicago and surrounding territory for the past two weeks has forced the owners of many small picture theaters to close their doors. But I have not heard of a single instance in which a commodious, well-ventilated picture house has been obliged to suspend business.

The extremely hot weather has also demonstrated that vaudeville lacks the power to draw patrons in paying numbers at this time. The Hamlin, a Sullivan and Considine vaudeville house, on West Madison Street and Hamlin Avenue, this city, with a seating capacity of 1400, substituted Licensed pictures on July 3rd for the customary program, and is showing to a paying instead of a losing business. On the night of July 7 the house had an attendance of 1600.

The Alhambra, a combination house in Milwaukee, playing Shubert attractions, has also turned to Licensed pictures for the summer and reports big business. This house seats 3,000 people, and, in addition to an excellent picture service, Manager Rothapfel offers his patrons high-class vocal numbers and selections by a fine orchestra.

Joseph Hopp, of the Standard Exchange (Independent), informs me that while his business has decreased owing to the closing of quite a number of small houses, where the owners must meet the rent of building as well as the cost of service, the decrease is not so large as he expected for such a severe heat. The better class of houses, Mr. Hopp stated, will be run throughout the summer.

Just as in Chicago, many large vaudeville houses in surrounding cities have turned to pictures and, in most cases, the owners have expressed the intention of retaining them permanently.

Here in Chicago, Lyman B. Howe has been running his picture programs at the Garrick for nearly six weeks. During that time many thousands of theater-goers, who never before attended a picture show, have been delighted with Mr. Howe's programs, and they have paid 25, 35 and 50 cents admission without a murmur. Most of the subjects are of the Licensed brand and they have been shown in Chicago picture theaters at 5 cents, some time ago. All of which serves to impress one that pictures, when presented in a large, comfortable and attractive house, with such excellent effects as Mr. Howe furnishes, will yield large profits despite hot weather and strong competition.

Influence of Chicago Exhibitors' Association.

The members of the building committee of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' Association of Chicago have done some effective work since appointment, as the following letter, which has been sent out to certain proprietors and managers of picture theaters by Murdock Campbell, commissioner of buildings in the City of Chicago, shows:

"You are hereby notified that the City Council Committee on Buildings has approved the operation of theaters within frame buildings provided the following is complied with:

"First.—One additional exit must be put in theater at rear or side, not less than four feet wide, and if any scenery is used, same must be of asbestos or sheet iron.

"Second.—If theater has living-rooms, or sleeping apartments over it, same shall be vacated permanently.

"You are hereby notified to comply with these provisions, otherwise no licenses will be approved."

The ordinance before the city council provided that all picture theaters in frame buildings should be closed, but the building committee from the Association appeared and showed that an injustice would be done a number of worthy people should the ordinance be passed in its original form. Thirty-two picture theaters in frame buildings were saved by the ordinance in its amended form.

C. C. Whelan has been appointed recording secretary of the Association, in place of John Bell, resigned.

The Association henceforth will meet on the first and third Monday of each month, in Franklin Hall, in the Fraternity Building, 19 West Adams Street.

It has been announced that delegates from the Chicago Association will be chosen to attend the national convention of exhibitors to be held at Cleveland, August 1. Representatives numbering 1,000, from all sections of the United States, will be present.

Carragien Comes to Life Again.

James B. Carragien, of St. Louis, who, in the expiring days of the I. P. & P. Co., of this city, created such a fuss in his attempt to purchase the interests of that Company from J. J. Murdock, is again in the limelight.

This time he appears in a minor rôle, as a recent article, with scare head, in a St. Louis paper, shows. To quote from the article referred to: "All the claim Ste. Genevieve County had on Sol Carragien, of 4015 Blaine Avenue, and James B. Carragien, his brother, of 4255 Washington Boulevard, was satisfied when James B. produced $53 last night. The Carragiens, who had been arrested, were then released.

"The two widely known amusement resort men were arrested on request of Sheriff Straughan of Ste. Genevieve County. Straughan told the police the Carragiens had sold a moving picture machine to Henry L. Rozier, of Ste. Genevieve town (which is the oldest in the State), and that the machine had refused to perform.

"Rozier sent it back, and the Carragiens sent out another machine. Whether or not the second threw pictures on the screen is not recorded, but Rozier is reported to have learned that the second machine was worth $53 less than the first, even if the first didn't work, and he demanded the difference. When it was not forthcoming, he caused the arrest of the Carragiens.

"Both were locked up at Central District Station yesterday. James B. was permited to go out with the Sheriff to get the $53. He got it."

The Progress Theater Company.

A. M. Gollas, owner of the Jefferson Theater, Jefferson Avenue and 55th street, this city, and interested in several other picture theaters here, announces that all these interests have been incorporated under the title of the Progress Theater Company. The officers of the company are: A. M. Gollas, secretary; Wm. H. Engleman, treasurer, and Mrs. Wm. H. Engleman, president. Licensed service is used in all the houses controlled by the company.

Technique of the Photoplay

Chapter I. The Photoplay and Its Making.

Contrary to the general belief, the photoplay is not pantomime, but a distinct dramatic form, the product of cinematography. It has its own rules of technique and an individuality distinct from pantomime, with its stilted language and rigid construction.

A story is the narration of events in words. Done into dialogue and action, it becomes a drama; substitute the conventional language of pantomime, the arbitrary gestures denoting certain thoughts and emotions, and the drama becomes pantomime. The photoplay is—or should be—related in purely natural action with such small aid as may be had from written or printed explanatory matter thrown upon the screen. The ideal photoplay is told entirely in self-explanatory action, without recourse to letters or other inserts.

The photoplay, then, becomes a story told in action instead of in words, and therefore is written in action instead of dialogue or polished phrase. The author supplies the groundwork of action and idea, but he is dependent upon the director and the actor for proper interpretation and expression.

Most photo-playwrights are familiar only with the filmed presentation of the photoplay. Only a few of the elect have the entree to the studio and editorial office where a knowledge of the possibilities and limitations of the camera may be obtained. The rest write blindly in the hope of achieving result. For the better understanding of the photo-playwright the processes are here described in brief.

How a Photoplay is Constituted.

The photoplay consists of from fifteen to thirty scenes, according to their length, supplemented by such explanatory matter as may be required to make clear the complications of the plot. These scenes are printed upon a band of transparent material somewhat similar to celluloid which is termed film. This film generally comes in lengths of 200 feet each and is made in two light speeds for negatives and positive prints. The scenes consist of successiions of pictures each one inch wide by three-fourths of an inch in height, these pictures being termed "frames" in the studio. A full subject, or reel, consists of from 900 to 1,000 feet of film, but two or more subjects may be used to give that length, forming what is termed a "split reel." Photoplays which may not be given complete within the limit of a single thousand-foot reel may be issued in two or more parts as a "two-reel" or "three-reel" subject. The thousand-foot length is merely a measure of convenience, the amount of film conveniently held in a machine at one time and a convenient standard of quantity for the exhibitor. A thousand-foot reel should run 18 to 20 minutes.

The photoplay manuscript, termed a scenario, may be developed by the editor from a studio idea, the contribution of some independent author or from some current or standard work of literature in its various forms of poems, song, drama or story.

The Scenario—How Handled.

The scenario is merely the story told in action and divided into scenes, each scene being all the action occurring in one setting at one time without the stoppage of the camera. Half a dozen scenes may be marked for the same setting and the action may be continuous, broken only by the insertion of explanatory matter, or the scenes may be represented as occurring at intervals of days or weeks.

The scenario is given to one of the directors, or producers, who assigns members of the stock company to the various parts, indicating the style of costume. He also prepares scene and property plots showing the stage carpenter and the property man what is required of them. The stage carpenter is expected to erect all of the interior scenes, but the director or his assistant arranges for the taking of the exterior scenes.

The interior scenes are made in the studio either under a skylight, with electric light, or a combination of the two. As soon as the settings are planned and erected all of the scenes occurring in that set are made, the exterior scenes being made before or after the interiors or in the intervals as may be most convenient. No effort is made to follow the proper order of scenes. If the setting for the last scene is the first made ready the last scene is played first and possibly one or two others in the same setting.

These scenes are made at a speed of fifteen or sixteen pictures to the second; the film being passed through the camera by a mechanism which brings the film to a stop at the moment that a revolving shutter moves its opening in front of the lense. The camera contains up to four hundred feet of film at one loading, but any amount of film may be exposed without return to the dark room.

Rehearsal of Scenes.

In rehearsing the scenes the director explains to the players the action of a single scene and this is gone through with until the actors understand their business, then the camera is set going and the scene is taken. Then the next scene is similarly rehearsed. The number of times a scene is rehearsed varies with the director and with the intricacy of the action, five to ten times being an average, though a troublesome scene may be gone over five or ten times as often.

In the field there is often little time to rehearse, but the players run through their parts to get their bearings. Usually the exteriors are made within a few miles of the studio, the players being carried in auto busses, but it not infrequently happens that a small company may be sent hundreds of miles to obtain a certain character of setting.

Prints are made from the negatives as soon as developed and in the meantime the inserted matter is prepared and photographed. The various strips, ranging from ten to one or two hundred feet, are cemented together in proper order and for the first time the photoplay is revealed.

If properly done the film is about the required length, but it is frequently found that a scene may be improved by cutting down or building up. Some scenes may need to be taken over, others may be eliminated completely or entirely new ones written; the revision corresponding to the work on a play the morning after a first production. When the play is declared to be right the negatives are marked to correspond to the cuts and a sufficient number printed from each to make up the orders.

Photographic Stage Setting.

The photographic stage differs from the actual setting in that the important action is planned to occur at a distance of from ten to twenty feet from the camera according to the lense used. The stage is six or eight feet wide by six deep, and though the horizon may form the actual limitation of the setting or be laid within an interior ten feet by twenty, the photographic stage remains the same.

This is due to the demand for pictures showing large figures which make for clearness of expression. It is all sadly inartistic, but it is what is required and to sell photoplays it is necessary to meet the demands of the producer. Moreover, it is better to plan your action to bring the active characters to the fore instead of leaving it to the director. Because of the narrowness of the stage it is not always easy to handle the action when two sets of characters occupy the photographic stage alternately, but it can be done. There are exceptions to this as to all other rules, but keep your active characters down front as much as possible. By active characters is understood those who are advancing the story at the moment.

It is well to bear in mind that the actual stage is fan-shaped rather than rectangular, growing broader as the distance from the camera increases. All of the space included within the angle of the lense comprises the actual stage and it is customary to establish the "lines" by tacking strips of wood or running actual lines from the edges of the photographic stages to the edges of the scene and the players are required to remain within these lines while engaged in a scene.

Classification of Photoplay.

The photoplay has the same classifications as the dramatic stage with drama, melodrama, comedy drama, comedy, farce comedy, farce, spectacle and extravaganza. Comedy—good comedy—is in greater demand than any other form since this is more difficult to obtain, but a striking idea of any sort will be accepted. Original ideas only are wanted. Adaptations, or visualizations, of poems, novels or plays can be prepared with greater skill by the editor or directors. The outside contributor should offer only his original ideas. It is a waste of time to submit adaptations as such, and to offer them as original material is dangerous. No men or set of men can be expected to know all written fiction and it may happen that a stolen idea will be accepted and paid for, but most companies use a form of receipt which must be signed by the author before a check is sent and to sign this form for a story derived from any source is sufficient evidence to convict the offender of obtaining money under false pretenses when discovery of the imposition is made.

Censorship.

Photo-playwrights whose stories deal with crimes of any sort should bear in mind the demand of the various censorships that exist in addition to the National Board of Censorship. Stories in which crime or the seamy side of life is introduced should point a strong moral and the actual commission of a crime should not be written. A burglar may be seen taking money from a safe, for instance, but he should not be seen breaking open the safe nor should his actual forcibly entry be depicted. He may be seen beside a closed window, but he cannot be shown jimmying the window in his effort to enter. It is a nice distinction, but since the powers that be decide against it the rule must be obeyed.

The finicalities of the censorships are largely due to the practice of juvenile offenders to explain that they were led to robbery through having seen the crime depicted in the pictures. It is seldom that the plea is a truthful one, but that has no bearing on the matter.

Stories submitted to the manufacturers of photoplays should be addressed to the general offices of the company, and a study of the style of work should be made before a story is sent. Some companies specialize, others offer a variety of subjects, but each has certain ear marks that should guide the expert salesman. It would be absurd to send a dainty love comedy to a company dealing exclusively in Western subjects or to offer a big military picture to a concern with small studio and a liking for small productions. A study of the bulletins of the manufacturers, printed weekly in the Moving Picture World, and a study of the photoplay on the screen, will enable the author to market his wares intelligently, saving both time and postage.

Some Scenarios—and Others

Emmett Campbell Hall.

A couple of neghbors of mine raise raspberries for the market, and the other day I happened to see the wagon-load each was sending in. I was not surprised when, the next morning, Neighbor Brown remarked disconsolately that "raspberries wasn't worth picking, hardly—only worth eight cents a quart," although Neighbor Green had told me that he sold his for twelve cents. I had seen the berries sent in by each.

Well, scenarios are not raspberries—I think almost everyone will admit that—but there are some scenarios, and others, just as there are some berries, and others. This occurs to me each time someone—Mr. Kitchell, this time—raises his voice in lamentation at the prices paid for scripts. Even at the cost of being unkind, I must say that if you take eight-cent berries to market, you are unlikely to get more than eight cents, and from personal knowledge and experience it seems to me that Mr. Kitchell and those others whose checks are stunted are doing just that thing. This, of course, is deduction merely. Those scripts which drag down eight to ten dollars may be worth ten times those sums, but I cannot help thinking that if they were, they would be apt to bring it.

I do not mean to imply that I think the average price paid for scenarios is adequate compensation for a good photo-drama—but then the average script isn't a good drama, or comedy, or farce, as the case may be. If it were, it would bring a fairly good price, even at the present stage of the game. I call a fairly good price $50 or better; two years from now I expect to call $100 a fairly good price.

Without desiring to make comparisons which are odious, it is necessary that I support my remarks with some statistics. During the twelve months ended June 30 last, I devoted about one-half of my working time to scenario writing, and with twelve scripts to hear from, find that that line netted the useful sum of $1,485, this amount being derived from six Licensed and three Independent companies. The best price received for a single scenario was $90; the lowest, $5. I took that five dollars because I knew, as well as did the editor, that the particular script wasn't worth more than that, to him or anyone else. Several scripts were sold at $20 each that should have brought more, but that happened to be the maximum price paid by the particular company, a fact known to me when I submitted them, so I had no kick to make. They were sent to that market for the simple reason that I did not wish to crowd my other markets just then, and those checks were each worth to me $20 more than the scripts.

Mr. Kitchell relates the sale of one scenario "taken by a reputable manufacturer for $8, including a detailed scene-plot and a synopsis." It would be interesting to know whether the picture was produced according to script, or whether the main idea only was available—judging by the price, I should say the latter was the case. If so, the scene-plot and other detail work was, of course, valueless to the producer. It may have been a splendid farce as originally conceived, possibly even better than when the director got through with it, but the producer could hardly be expected to pay for scene-plots and things which he did not expect to use—and the author was at liberty to refuse the check if the script was worth more than eight dollars to him. I agree with Mr. Kitchell that comedy does not pay as well as dramatic stuff, and would like to know what "Man About Town" calls "big money." Twenty-five dollars is not big money in my section, and that is a pretty good average price for a comedy that is funny right through.

I am free to confess that at one time I had the idea that $25 was about the limit of the scenario editor's imagination; then it occurred to me that it might be worth while to turn out a script that seemed to me worth $50—and three weeks later I cashed that check, and had learned a valuable lesson.

If one has the peculiar kink in the mind that makes scenario writing a natural, unforced process, and can turn out scripts that are worth a fair price, he has a good thing, but if his efforts command but ten or fifteen dollars (and I contend that a scenario will command about what it is worth), he had better try some other game. There must be nearly a thousand scenarios written for each one produced.

The dramatic merit of the photoplay, on the whole, is on the upgrade, with just at present a sad backsliding to cowboys and "guns" for the sake of the European trade. Just now a photoplay of the comparative merit of "Hamlet" would not bring over $100, but I sincerely believe that if you can put one across that is worth it, you can get your hundred—though I didn't believe it until I got that ninety. Provided, of course, you send it to the right place.

I must also give Mr. Craw a little attention, in view of his recurrent alarm concerning the "piracy" which he seems to think so prevalent in the moving picture offices. He has gone to considerable pains to point out just how a scenario may be coprighted—or may not be copyrighted, or something about a copyright for a scenario—to protect the poor author from the loss of his valuable ideas while the scenario is "being hawked about the country to the various producers, lying about on the desks of scenario editors," etc. Among what class of producers does Mr. Craw "hawk about" his scenarios that he conceives them lying about on desks, etc., accessible to the pirates he so much fears? or does he think the editors or directors will suddenly appear from the property room wearing big boots and a brace of pistols and waving a skull and cross-bone flag? Having sold a total of something over one hundred scenarios—about 90 per cent of those written by me—I think I am in a position to know something of the subject under discussion, and I have not yet felt the necessity of protecting my ideas by copyright while the scripts remained in the hands of the gentlemen running the editorial departments of the film manufacturing companies.

The entire matter might be disposed of by remarking that my experience has been that they are gentlemen, most agreeabl to do business with. Mr. Craw's proposition that a copyright is vitally necessary to protect a script submitted is decidedly insulting to the editorial departments of the producing companies. Who ever heard of an author copyrighting a manuscript before submitting it to a reputable magazine? Why the dark suspicion—apparently to Mr. Craw a certainty—that the picture editors are more prone to literary theft than the readers in the editorial rooms of Harper's or The Century? In view of my remarks above, it is, of course, unnecessary to say that I never encountered the piracy which Mr. Craw thinks so rampant—but then, I never "hawked about" my scenarios—just mailed them to the manufacturing companies, by whom they were either accepted or courteously declined."

The Murder of Othello

By H. F. Hoffman.

It may be wrong for a writer in one department to go browsing around in the pasture of another. Mr. Richardson is supposed to be conducting the projection department of this paper, and no doubt I am violating all professional ethics when I deliberately steal some of his thunder. I have noticed that sometimes operators have criticised him because he goes to a show and then writes a "knock" about the operator.

If Mr. R. were not so capable of taking care of himself I might feel sorry for him and be inclined to help him out, but as it is I know he would not thank me for such a foolish proceeding on my part. However, there is no law that I can find against the giving of moral support, and therefore whatever I may write here about the operator will come under the head of Moral Support.

Many of you exhibitors make use of a little slide that reads: "If you like our show tell others; if not, tell us." Then when someone tells you your show is awfully bad you call it a "knock" and mumble something about deadheads being the biggest kickers, etc. That is, some of you do, but the majority of you take the criticism in the spirit in which it is given.. The politicians say, "Let the tariff be reformed, but only by its friends," and we say, "Let the moving picture be reformed, but only by its friends."

Someone has got to do the kicking; that is a certainty, and we feel to a large extent the burden falls upon us who have the welfare of moving pictures at heart. We wish that everything about them were perfect, so we would not have to criticise. We believe we will live to see the day when they will be as nearly perfect as possible, but we also realize that nothing was ever improved by trying to gloss over the faults. One of the best ways to learn things is to learn by making mistakes. Teddy Roosevelt says that the only way to make a people correct their faults is to keep reminding them of those faults. In other words, "Ding it into 'em."

There has been considerable written in the past in these pages about bad projection, etc., and the chances are that there will be and ought to be considerably more, just so long as there are exhibitors who stand for films to be run without titles or with the words reading backwards, or a dozen other stupid sins of comission or omission that are to be seen daily almost anywhere. The only way to remedy the fault is to keep on dinging about it.

Your little slide that says "If you like our show tell others; if not, tell us," is all very pretty on the screen, but it doesn't amount to much. If you are an exhibitor you know very well that none of your patrons comes to you and tells you your show is "rotten." In the first place, they wouldn't want to hurt your feelings, and secondly, they won't take a chance on you swelling up and asking what people will want next for a nickel. If you are an exhibitor you also know that the public is fickle. You know that they simply reverse your little slide. When you show is good they tell you, and when it is bad they tell others. They like to flatter you, perhaps in the hope of getting on the free list some day. Your faults they relate to your competitor up the street because they may think he likes to hear it and may possibly grant them the freedom of his house, or something else. I don't know why they do it, but they do.

The opinions of lay critics are not very safe guides, as I have found out once or twice to my sorrow. The public judges by results only. With them a picture is either good or bad, but they could not tell exactly why. Their criticism is not analytical. They do not know good projection from bad, except in the most superficial way. When the operating is bad you never hear them say, "What poor projection they have here." No; you are more apt to hear them say "I like the pictures, but they hurt my eyes." When the projection is good they forget about the technical end and lose themselves in the picture itself. Why? Because things are as they ought to be; they expect good projection when they come. They have a right to expect it.

At one time I was press agent of one of the largest three-ring circuses. Every time we went to Atlanta I had trouble with a certain editor who was very stingy with his space. Finally I met him one day in Savannah and he was out of a job. I had long determined to bring him to time if ever the opportunity came, and here it was, so I invited him to lunch with me. When we were comfortably settled I handed him the following: "Will you be kind enough to tell me why it is that if a performer were to climb to a trapeeze, and there perform some of the most dizzy, dazzling, desperate, dare-devil, dreadful, death-defying deeds, done with a deftly dashing debonaire, dwarfing dull description; can you tell me why it is that if he did such a wonderful act you would give him only an inch of space in your paper, whereas if another performer got up there and was so absolutely incompetent that he fell and broke his d—n neck you would give him a couple of columns of space?"

He looked at me a few moments and smiled; then he said, "Yes, I will tell you. Your wonderful performer would be doing only what he was supposed to do. The other fellow by falling would have done the unexpected and it is the unexpected that makes news. The people who paid their admission had a right to expect that they were going to see that man do what he was advertised to do." And so it is with projection. The public have a right to expect good operating, instead of a lot of breaks and stops and flickers and ghosts and burning reels, and when these things happen it is up to the men who gather news to say something about it.

Now then, having brushed away opposition from all sources, let us proceed with the Murder of Othello. He was murdered by an operator last Friday night. They took him out of his tin armour and placed him on the operating table in the operating room. They made a diagnosis, gave him an anasthetic, then put him through a sausage machine and when the poor fellow came out of the other end he was mangled beyond recognition.

I had been talking just before with the manager. He said, "Yes, I take the Moving Picture World. A manager should not be without it because it is so full of valuable advice. Have you noticed our solid brick operating room?" I then took notice. The place was an airdome seating at least 1,500, with loads of room to spare. Behind the rear seats was a promenade fifty feet wide, and there at the end of the middle aisle stood the solid brick oven on four legs. It covered an area about six feet square or 36 square feet. He could have built a two-story residence there without interfering with anyone's view, and yet he who took the World for its helpful hints had contructed this 6 x 6 oven and called it an operating room. Oh, Brother Richardson, you will have to use bigger type.

The Othello picture began with the usual chorus—"What's the name of this?" "I wonder what this is." "Mamma, who's that man?" "Did you get the name?" "I beg pardon, sir, did you notice the title of this?" "I wish I knew what this is all about." "What is it?" "I don't know, looks like something from the Bible." "What did it say?" "Excuse me, was there any name to this?" "No, I didn't see any," etc. Now in the name of just plain common sense, I am going to ask why this thing is done, day after day, in so many places. Is it possible that a man can have the nerve to call himself a manager or an operator, and still show such indifference to the one thing of all that brings the people to the place—the picture?

I would like to have a photograph of the mind of such a man to see by what mental process he concludes that the audience knows what it is looking at. After the first offense, if that party were in my employ, he would last about as long as a June frost. All this talk about reels coming from the exchange without titles is a lazy man's excuse. Cover glass is cheap and title slides can be written in half a minute. Fancy lettering is not necessary and takes up too much time. There is nothing in a temporary slide that looks any better than good plain handwriting, especially if the slide is tinted and the principal words are properly capitalized and underscored. Try it and you will find it better than most of these horrible hand-printed affairs.

The big laugh in Othello came with the first scene when the title and sub-titles came through reading backwards. It was the same laugh you hear when a song slide gets in upside down. But the fun didn't end there. Instead of clipping his film at once and reversing the upper reel, the operator let the whole thing go through the way it was. We are all aware that Othello is not the easiest subject in the world to follow, even under the best of circumstances. The title and all the sub-titles are extremely necessary, even to those who know it, and a good lecture should go with it for those who do not. Imagine the audience then, for the most part in utter ignorance of what they were looking at. The light was vile. The patrons had their choice of two things to look at. On the sheet the spectacle of a white woman smearing her love upon a colored man, or in the operating room, the operator who had attracted their attention.

It seems that in his dilemma he had hit upon the idea of hiding his mistake by speeding up his machine when the sub-titles appeared, so as to get them over with quickly. But the racket of it only made matters worse by drawing their attention to him. All thought of how the audience was enjoying the picture was far from his mind, but they were enjoying it just the same. They quickly saw that he was trying to pull the wool over their eyes so they began to watch for the sub-titles. When these appeared and he put on the high speed the audience would howl with delight. He was greeted with mock applause, laughter, cat calls and other noises. Nobody felt bad when Othello breathed his last. The program was short on comedy anyhow, and this filled the bill very nicely. On my part, for a long time to come, I will remember the murder of Othello.

The Coming National Convention of Exhibitors

Preparations for the Great Event, Which Is To Take Place in Cleveland, Are Complete.

F. M. Kenney,
Chairman of Committee

O. M. Christenson,
Secretary

W. C. Kasper,
Treasurer

Preparations for the National Convention of Moving Picture Exhibitors are as complete as the zealous labors of competent committees can make them. Unless all signs fail, the National Convention will be one of the greatest events in the history of American filmdom. One of the most indefatigable workers in the cause is Mr. M. A. Neff, the president of the Exhibitors' League of Ohio and a resident of Cincinnati. Mr. Neff sends out the following, which the Moving Picture World prints in full in view of its importance. Mr. Neff in his letter says:

"The National Convention of Moving Picture Exhibitors to be held in Cleveland, O., August 1, 1911, will be a grand success. The interest in this convention is growing every hour and exhibitors all over the United States and Canada have become interested in the movement. The Ohio Exhibitors' League, through their efficient, energetic, hard work, have made such wonderful progress that they have strengthened and encouraged every movement throughout the country.

"The convention will be held in Weber's Hall, located on Superior Avenue directly opposite the postoffice and city hall, Cleveland, Ohio. The convention will have at their disposal the whole of the third floor of this large building. All manufacturers of moving picture machines and supplies are invited to make an exhibit. Ample committee rooms and space for exhibits have been provided for.

"All exhibitors of moving pictures in the United States and Canada are invited to attend this meeting. Every exhibitor who expects to attend will please send name and address to the Exhibitors' League, 703 Euclid Ave., Cleveland, O., where headquarters of the committee having the arrangements in hand has been established. The committee must know in avance the number of exhibitors that expect to attend.

"Five hundred dollars has already been secured to give a banquet to the exhibitors attending this meeting. Everyone who can attend the banquet will please write the committee, so covers can be laid for all. A grand banquet and a good time will be had after the first day's work is over. The convention will probably last two or three days. The important features of the moving picture business will be discussed freely and any exhibitor's counsel and advice will be gladly listened to.

"Again we wish to assure every bona fide exhibitor that he is welcome. Not only welcome, but we urge everyone that possibly can attend, whether they belong to any local or state exhibitors' league or association, that they attend this Convention.

"The future prosperity of the moving picture exhibitor depends upon a thorough organization. If you hear anybody knock this convention, just remember a knock is a boost, as it is a positive fact that any one who knocks does not want a fair, square deal for the exhibitor.

"There is one of two things to choose from—organization, or quit business. Let the thought and the word be 'organize.' Co-operate, and help one another. Get together for mutual protection and benefit, and remember August 1, 1911, 'On to Cleveland,' every exhibitor who believes in commercial rights and liberty."

JOHN J. HUSS,
Treasurer of the Exhibitors' League of Ohio.

Mr. Huss is part owner and manager of the Royal Theater, on Vine Street, Cincinnati, Ohio; also interested in the Colonial, the Sun, the Gem and Star in that city. Mr. Huss is also in the clothing business and a large real estate owner in Cincinnati, a thorough believer in organization and a good worker.

A WELCOME AID TO EXHIBITORS.

The Imp Company proposes to release an exceptionally meritorious reel in the near future. It is called "The Call of the Song" and in its desire to aid the exhibitor in a proper presentation of the reel the Imp Company have issued a set of instructions for the pianist and singer. Every exhibitor will be provided with a copy of these instructions, in time to allow of an intelligent rehearsal. The music will also be provided.

Moving Picture Actor Drowned

Albert Brighton, leading man for the Henry Belmar Moving Picture Company, was drowned in a pond near Grassmere, Staten Island, N. Y., July 11. In the center of the pond, which covers six acres and is twenty feet deep in places, a lily had been dropped, and Brighton rowed toward it. As he got close to the lily Miss Murray leaned far over the side of the boat and, as pre-arranged, fell into the water. Brighton dropped his oars and with a neat dive went after the woman. She was struggling, but held the lily in her hand. An audience of 100 watched the scene breathlessly.

Albert Brighton.

The actors and the spectators watched for him to reappear, expecting to see him rise many feet from shore. The seconds passed, however, and there was no sign of Brighton. Mr. Kerrington in another boat picked up the actress and then rowed rapidly toward the spot where Brighton had entered the water. Other actors and many men of the spectators got other boats and rowed about the pond. There was no sign of Brighton, however.

Then some of the natives began to tell how the pond had a bottom of quicksand and how many other persons had lost their lives in it. Word was sent to the police at Tompkinsville and they came with grappling irons. They dragged the pond for hours before they finally got Brighton's body from the bottom, where the actor had stuck fast after his dive.

Mr. Brighton, though only 35 years of age, was well known in his profession. He began his theatrical career in the Southwest, where he later became popular as leading man of several stock companies. He made his entry into the moving picture field with the Edison Company of New York. After eighteen months, he signed with the Nestor Film Company to play juvenile leads, but was soon playing leads in their Western dramas by virtue of his thorough knowledge of the West.

Mr. Brighton left the Nestor Company several months ago, and, until hs recent engagement with the Belmar Company, was actively interested in the movement for the relief of sufferers from the "Sleeping Sickness" in Africa. Mr. Brighton was a splendid actor, adapting himself with ease to comedy or drama. The Nestor Company speak with much praise of his work. Had he signed the second contract offered by them, he might be alive to-day.

Among Mr. Brighton's most successful work were the lead parts in "Sleepy Hollow," "At Cedar Ridge," "At Panther Creek," "The Bridal Trail," and others, all by the Nestor Company. He was especially strong in the portrayal of roles of rugged heroism, such, for instance, as the one in which he met his death. Mr. Brighton leaves a widow. They were married only last October. The Moving Picture World extends its sympathy to the widow and relatives. The best consolation it has to offer is that Mr. Brighton still lives. Though not in the flesh, he lives in more than spirit. His living image is preserved in moving pictures, and while he may be gone forever, he is not lost forever and those who love him best can always see him as he was. Among many other good things, the moving picture is one of the greatest of consolations to those who are thoughtful enough to have their loved ones filmed while they are living.

The Call of the Song (Imp).

A very pretty Imp picture, called "The Call of the Song," is to be released on August 3d. The story itself deals with the old theme of the lure of the city and the more subtle and eventually triumphant charm of the homestead in the country, where the slighted sweetheart, trembling on the verge of despair and insanity, still cherishes the memory of her first lover and fondly waits for his return. A song, that they often sang together amid the fragrance of the roses, wakes the slumbering love and conscience of the indifferent lover and leads him back into the arms of his old sweetheart. The acting is good throughout and the settings are strikingly beautiful. What deserves especial praise is the accurate portrayal of American country life, the scenes in the school and in and about the post office and the grocery store are charming in their naturalness and reflect great credit on the stage director. In order to aid the exhibitor in the proper instructions both to pianist and singer and if these instructions are intelligently followed with the splendid picture on the screen the audience will not be backward with its applause.

NEW BALTIMORE PICTURE THEATER.

The Picture Garden is the name of a new theater on Lexington Street, between Liberty and Charles Streets, Baltimore, Md. The opening exhibition was given Saturday, July 8th, to a crowded house and "Mutt and Jeff" pictures were the feature of the program, with illustrated songs by Mr. Archie Lloyd. The Picture Garden is advantageously located in the shopping dstrict and is handsomely equipped throughout. H. A. Fitzgerald is the proprietor, and the manager is Mr. Edward R. Price. A five cent admission is charged.

Want Sanitary Booths

Cleveland Operators Appeal to the City Council for Relief—Specifications Submitted—A Subject of General Interest.

Better ventilation for operating booths of picture theaters is being made the subject of a determined effort on the part of Local No. 160, Moving Picture and Projecting Machine Operators' Union, of Cleveland, Ohio, to secure better conditions. In an effort to obtain official action, an address setting forth the operators' grievances has been presented to the Cleveland Common Council. It reads as follows:

To the Honorable Council of Cleveland:

There have been enacted into law in recent years as part of the building code of the city and state certain requiremeuts iu reference to the coustruction of moving picture theatres, which have for their object the protection of the audiences visiting these theaters. In formulating the requirements for moving picture theatres we feel the health and well-being of the moving picture operator have not been given the consideration they should have.

The operating booths of the moving picture theatres are located near the ceiling, the most disadvantageous position for uatural ventiiation.

Air ordinarily contains: 79 per ceut. of nitrogen, 20.8 per cent. of oxygen, .2 per cent of carbon dioxide.

When it is exhaled from tthe lungs it contains: 79 per cent. of nitrogen, 15.4 per cent. of oxygen, 5.6 per cent. of carbon dioxide.

There is a loss of 5.4 per cent. of the amount of oxygen in air when exhaled from the lungs over the amount of oxygen inhaled, and a gain of 5.4 per cent. of carbon dioxide. Oxygen is necessary to sustain life, whereas carbon dioxide will kill life.

When the amount of carbon dioxide in air is increased it naturally rises and thus the air containing a large amount of carbon dioxide which is exhaled from the lungs of the audience in moving picture theatres naturally rises to tthe operating booth, where, if there is no artificial system of ventiiation, it is inhaled by the moving picture operator, to the detriment of his health. That this statement is not a theory is proven by the fact that although our organization has been in existeuce only two years, during that time four of our members have died from tuberculosis.

We believe that an artificial system of ventilation is an absolute necessity in moving picture operating booths in order to conserve the lives of the operators. The fact that the majority of operating booths are steel lined adds to the intensity of the heat in these booths, because the steel acts as an insulator and prevents the escape of the heated atmosphere.

Article No. 4 of the following specifications you will note calls for a vent pipe to carry off carbon dioxide and the heat generated in the booth by the projecting arc lamp or lamps, and Article 3, for an 18-inch electric fan to ventilate the booth and to carry off the carbon dioxide which is exhaled by the audience and which goes to the ceiling of the theatre and is breathed by the operator if not carried off in some manner.

We, the members of the Moving Picture and Projecting Machine Operators' Union, Local No. 160, I. A. T. S. E., realizing that we are working under conditions which are injurious to our well-being, and believing that measures preventing the tendency toward tuberculosis among moving picture operators will not only be beneficial to ourselves, but to the community as a whole, present for your consideration and enactment into law the following specifications for construction of moving picture operating booths. These requirements are already part of the law of tthe states of New York, Illinois, Massachusetts and California.

SPECIFICATIONS.

Art. 1. All projecting machine booths shall not be less than seven (7) feet high. The floor space shall be according to the number of machines in the booths, regulated as follows: One (1) machine in booth: The booth to be not less than eight (8) feet wide by nine (9) feet long. Two (2) or more machines in booth, and not exceeding three (3): The booth shall not be less than eight (8) feet wide by fiftcen (15) feet long.

Art. 2. All picture machine booths shall have at least one door, the dimensions of which to be not less than six (6) feet high by two and one-half (2½) feet wide, said door must open outward.

Art. 3. Near the center of the booth shall be a circular opening of not less than (24) iuches diameter; said opening must have an 18-inch vent pipe leading to outside of building or to a special incombustible vent flue. In the circular opening shall be placed an 18-inch exhaust fan.

Art. 4. Over each arc lamp of machine or machines shall be placed an incombnstible pipe of not less than six (6) inches in diameter. In this vent pipe shall be placed a twelve (12) inch electric fan. Said pipe to lead to the outside of building or to an incombustible vent flue.

Art. 5. Wherever possible, there shall be at least two (2) windows in booth. Said windows to be not less than three (3) feet square. Said windows to be near ceiling of booth.

Art. 6. All booths must be provided with at least four (4) inlets not less than fifteen (15) inches long, three (3) inches high, the lower slide not to be more than three (3) inches above the floor level. Said inlets to be covered on the inside by wire net of not greater than one-eighth (⅛) inch mesh.

Art. 7. All rheostats for arc lamps must be kept outside of booths. We deem it advisable to have them out of the booth, as they cast off a considerable amount of heat, and in order to avoid all possibility of trouble and danger.

Local No. 160, Moving and Projecting Machine Operators' Union, I. A. T. S. E.

From the foregoing it will be seen that the Health Committee of Local 160 has made a careful analysis of the unsanitary conditions under which operators are compelled to labor and have asked but reasonable measures for relief. As this subject is one that interests all operators in cities and states requiring steel booths, the fight of the Cleveland operators will be watched with interest.

A singular commentary upon the conditions under which operators are compelled to labor is provided in the following letter from the medical director of a prominent insurance cmpany:

Springfield, Mass., June 20, 1911.

E. W. Snyder, General Agent,
Cleveland, Ohio.

Dear Sir:

The application of Otto C. Hauber is before us, and I am sorry to advise you the same has been declined.

Operators of moving pictnre machines, we have never considered snch risk as our company would be justified in assuming. We class such occupation as extra hazardous, owing to the liabi lity of explosion and fire, and the probable inability of the operator to escape injury, owing to the close quarters in which he works.

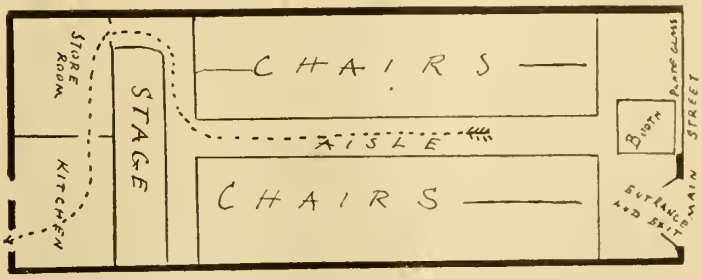
I am sorry to disappoint you in this matter.

Yours truly,
(Signed) G. S. STEBBINS,
Medical Director.

A Dangerous Theater

While some cities and underwriters are pushing the precautions against fire to the extreme, certain authorities seem to be blind and tolerate things that should not exist. In a certain small town I have found a very dangerous moving picture theater. The place can seat 200 persons, but in case of a fire, it is safe to predict that at least half would perish. As it is not my intention to ruin the business of the man who needs to show motion pictures for a living and as I do not wish to call down the authorities, ignorant of the danger, I will call the town in question X—and hope that when these lines will reach the exhibitor and the authorities, alterations will be made, to insure the safety of the public.

The following diagram will illustrate the dangerous condition of the place:



It is a long hall a few steps from the ground and part of a new substantial brick building. The hall, with only one large door on the main street, serving for entrance and exit, is divided in three sections: The front part acting as the auditorium, the second section, the stage, the third section is divided into two small rooms, one a sort of store room and the last one a kitchen. The front of the place has a large plate glass. The rear of the place has, in the kitchen, a small window and a small door opening on a back yard. The side walls are brick. One side wall is a heavy partition wall with no door or window. The other wall, also heavy brick, has a few windows, but they are small and near the ceiling, they should be called mere transoms and cannot be reached without a ladder. The booth is placed next to the entrance. If a film should ignite, the flames would shoot around the operating booth and play in front of the only practical exit door. The spectators would be pushed backwards towards the stage and their only way to safety would be to follow the arrow shown in dotted lines. If we follow this arrow, we can see that many turns are necessary to reach the small exit door of the kitchen. There is no doubt in my mind that the crush would be such as to jam the narrow passage near the stage and the spectators would fall on top of each other, blocking the passage to others. There would be no escape, as no ladders are provided and no one could escape through the high windows. It is true that the operating booth is supposed to be a fireproof, galvanized booth, but to save a little space between the said booth and the front plate glass, the door has been removed from its hinges and the operator would never have time to replace the door. The iron booth is provided with a top flue for the escape of the fumes and flames, but as this flue has never been connected with any pipe, the flames would shoot through this flue and set the ceiling on fire. It is supposed to be a fireproof iron booth, but it is worse than no booth. Another fault with the place is that the owner, instead of paying the wages of a competent operator, placed his son, a young, green man, in charge of the machine. A good, competent operator can act in case of emergency, but a novice will merely add to the confusion. If the owner was to place his curtain against the plate glass of the front of the hall and the operating booth on the stage, there would be less danger as the main exit door would not be closed by the flames. The next best plan to insure perfect safety would be to open two large exit doors in the solid brick wall, to lead into the alley. I am sorry to have to call the attention of the authorities to this very dangerous theater as I do not wish to place more hardship on the exhibtor, but if we neglect to do our duty we will see more disastrous fires and more restrictions placed on the theaters. The owner of the moving picture theater has not been in the game more than a couple of months;, in fact, he does not know how dangerous is the handling of the films and most likely he is ignorant of all the fires of the past. In the course of time, he will find out all the drawbacks of the business, but in the meantime we cannot be like the old farmer: wait until the horse is gone to lock the door of the barn. As this is the first moving picture theater in the town, the authorities themselves are no better posted than the owner of the place, and it is better for us to show them the danger than to wait for a fire to open their eyes. With the Western Producers

By Richard V. Spencer.

The Co-operative Film Mfg. Company, on Sunday, June 25, filmed the dances and amusements of the local Scandinavian Society picnic, held on that date, securing some 1,300 feet of film. The society had contracted with the company to take 2,500 feet of film; however, a bitter controversy among the members of the society's executive committee, in which the three nationalities participated, delayed the dances until afternoon, causing the postponement of some of the more important ceremonies until the following Sunday when it is hoped to have the dancers present unhampered by a mob of curious spectators, who, last Sunday, interfered with photography by persisting in getting into camera range. T. K. Peters, the inventor of the new non-infringing camera that the company are using, and his chief mechanic, M. Sasir, after working all the preceding night, had completed a new one thousand foot film magazine, the first, to the writer's knowledge, that has ever been used upon a moving picture camera. The new magazine was given its first tryout Sunday and proved to be successful in every way. The adoption of the new magazine is a departure from the camera's former design, having the effect of narrowing the camera boxing with the magazine projecting a foot in the rear. The Swedish Consul and others on the Scandinavian Society's executive committee have made arrangements to take the remaining 1,200 feet of film the coming Sunday, when the dancers and other participants only will be present and unhampered by the curiosity of spectators.

The Western Essanay Company under the management and direction of Mr. G. M. Anderson, are now at work at San Raphael, near San Francisco. The company will remain at San Raphael seven months. Mr. Anderson has just returned from a brief business trip to Chicago, bringing back Mrs. Anderson, his wife, with him. The company are about to put on a "one actor cast" film, in which Mr. Anderson will feature Miss Anna Little in the one and leading rôles.

Miss Queenie Mack, recently playing leads with the Essanay Western Stock Company, has left that company and affiliated herself with the Co-operative Film Mfg. Stock Company to play leading roles. Miss Mack is well and favorably known in local moving picture circles. Her presence and ability will prove a valuable addition to the new stock company, the output of which, the writer of this article predicts, will make decided "splash" when the company have completed their pre-release reels and entered the market with their films.

The Co-Operative Company last week took an 1800-foot educational film, which will be used in the lectures of Adam Dixon Warner, a famous travelogue lecturer known from coast to coast. The film was made to the order of Mr. Warner, and included various pictures of Los Angeles street scenes, public parks, fine residential districts, views of other city attractions, and several hundred feet of film taken at the beach resorts and suburban cities. The film when completed will be shown all over the United States, accompanied by an attractive and instructive lecture by Mr. Warner. The company have a series of other big contracts about to be fulfilled by them in photographing big industrial plants and other films of advertising interest. The company intend to begin daily work on their pictures about July 15th.

Secretary Charles Kays, of the Brawley (Cal.) Chamber of Commerce, together with a number of prominent business men of the Imperial Valley city, have perfected arrangements wherby the city and the Valley are to be given moving picture publicity. Mr. Kavs has arranged with a local moving picture manufacturing company by which a 1500-foot film will be taken of the various phases of the cantaloupe industry, from the picturesque picking in the field, packing, hauling, loading cars, icing cars moving trainloads of the popular melons, together with views of the annual cantaloupe fiesta held in the valley, which includes an industrial parade, firemen's tournament, aviation feats, and various sports and races. The completed film will be shown in thousands of moving picture theaters all over the United States and abroad, and will show the public the industry at its best.

Mr. and Mrs. James Young Deer, at present in New York on business in the interest of the company, are expected back in Los Angeles by July 2nd, after which, it is said, work at the studio will be actively resumed on the pictures. During the interval, the members of the Pathe Stock Company are enjoying their brief vacation.

Selig.—The Selig Company on June 30th photographed the gathering of the American Medical Association at the Busch Gardens in Pasadena. The A. M. A. are holding their annual convention in Los Angeles, and on the 30th were the guests of Mr. Adolphus Busch, the well known St. Louis millionaire, at his beautiful summer home and famous sunken garden, Pasadena estate. These beautiful gardens have been visited by hundreds of thousands of beauty-loving tourists. Last year the Selig Company staged a costume play on the grounds.

The Bison Company actors and mechanical force are the busiest people in town this week. They are rushing preparations for their trip to Bear Valley, and taking pictures between times. Crate after crate of scenery and "props" have been already packed, and the end is not yet in sight. The coming trip will be the most expensive ever taken by any of the local producers. Forty people will be taken North by the company, and thirty head of horses. The Company leaves on the 10th and will be gone from three to five months.

The local branch of the Selig Stock Company, under the personal direction of Mr. Francis Boggs, leaves on the 7th for Santa Cruz, Cal. They plan to be gone about ten days, and will film a series of marine pictures on the Santa Cruz coast.

Miss Ardis Allworth, who until recently has been playing leads with the Robinson-Allworth Dramatic Company, of New York, has left that company and is now on the way West to join the stock company of the Co-Operative Film Manufacturing Co., producers of the Fox Brand films, soon to be in the market. Miss Allworth has signed a contract with the Co-Operative Company to play character leads and other important parts. Her acquisition should prove a valuable asset to the new stock company.

The Selig actors of the local half of the stock company have found a new use for the big concrete tank on the studio grounds. This tank, about thirty feet square and six feet deep, used for staging marine and trick pictures, has been filled with water, and every evening after work some of the actors may be seen enjoying a refreshing plunge bath in the tank.

Boston

These columns have contained considerable about the Columbia Theater, which Marcus Loew was reported to have acquired. In writing these columns I have always held that Marcus Loew really had acquired the house, even though its present owners, Messrs. Farren and Edwards, had declared it untrue. All legal trouble and questionings have now been finally silenced, as Mr. Loew has formally come into possession of the Columbia, which he hopes to open on Labor Day with the usual Loew brand of "pop" vaudeville and pictures. Mr. Loew has left contracts in this city for the complete renovation of the Columbia.

The terriffic heat put a decided crimp in the business of local moving picture houses. Every "legitimate" theater in Boston is closed, none of them being able to withstand the heat. Moving picture theaters are certainly doing much better than their big brothers, as they find it possible to remain open.

The Majestic Theater, which was playing stock company attractions, was forced to close the latter half of the week of July 3, owing to the heat. All local moving picture theaters remained open.

Mr. George Delmore, connected with the Bowdoin Square and Howard theaters, has jumped to Maine on a vacation, leaving the moving picture end of these two houses to his lieutenant. Mr. Delmore has put in a very busy season and certainly deserves his respite.

Manager Joseph L. Roth, of the Olympic Theater, Bowdoin Square, has decided to cut out his vaudeville program for the balance of the summer, and is using W. E. Greene's Independent service and songs.

The pictures of the Coronation of King George V of England were not able to stimulate trade in local houses, as the pictures were released during the hottest weather of the year.

HENRY.

Mr. Max Lewis, of the Co-Operative Independent Film Company, of Denver and Salt Lake City, spent a few days of this week in New York. He stated that his mission was just plain business, but from the earnest head-to-head conversations he was having with some of the leading Independent film moguls, it looked as though something "big" is soon to be put over.

Education and Science

"PRIEST HALTS FILM SHOW TO DENOUNCE PICTURE OF NUNS."

The above heading on the first column of the first page of the New York Herald of July 9th gives it world-wide importance. It appears that the Very Rev. Dean York, having occasion to call upon the manager of the Bijou Theater, at Huntington, L. I., was invited by him to see the pictures. It happened that one of the pictures shown was entitled "The Nun," a picture released last May, consequently fairly well known to most exhibitors by this date.

After seeing the picture, Dean York there and then openly denounced it, contending that it was not only "untruthful," but "a libel upon the most devoted women of the world.". There is no doubt this is the first time in the history of moving pictures where such a public denunciation has been made, unfortunately with perfect truth and reason. It is to be regretted that the advice, instructions and warnings which are constantly being given upon these pages are so little heeded. It is pure ignorance for the readers of these pages to describe and treat as "knockings" the just criticisms and corrections often given here. Untruthfulness in religious pictures has been pointed out over and over again, also the fact that a levity bordering upon the sacreligious seems to be the attitude of writers and players towards both office and men of the sacred profession.

In "The Nun" the treatment and characterizations of both priest and sisterhood is an outrage upon a noble body of people, while the breaking of the crucifix is an act so blasphemous and desecrating as to cause a thrilling shock of horror to pass over the beholder—worse perhaps than that occasioned by the witnessing of a murderous crime. This indecent outrage is not an insult against the Roman Catholic Church only, but an offense against all Christendom—yea, against civilization itself, and is repugnant to everybody. The only credit the originators of this film can take to themselves lies in their immediately withdrawing it from the exhibition, and most effectually destroying it. They will by so doing atone for the wrong done, respect public decency, admit the error or oversight which sent it forth, and redeem their good name; besides restoring moving pictures to the high level from which this lamentable film has pulled them down.

Dean York further gives forth the threat that he will use his wide influence and the influence of his church in warning people against moving pictures. It is to be hoped this will not be necessary, if the good dean reads these strictures, he will know that the picture which so justly aroused his ire is not a representative one, or even a type of what moving pictures are today supposed to be. Conceived in irreverent thoughtlessness, and executed by more blameable carelessness, it found its way into the world almost before its existence was noticed; there is little doubt that had it been seen by the censors of the Moving Picture World, it would not have appeared in public except as it passed over defiantly the strictures which would have been passed upon it, and which now appear even at this late date—but not too late, we trust, to offset and eradicate if possible the evil its appearance has caused.

A GREAT CHANGE.

Ten years ago, when Coney Island was about the most crude and vulgar pleasure resort in the world, the far-famed and justly notorious "barker" was a unique character; like as the ugly bull terrier is the perfection of ugliness, so the "barker" was the perfection of impudence, ignorance and vulgarity. With its many advances and changes, the "barker," too, has become educated in Coney Island. No longer does he rend the air with his rancorous voice, calling customers to the questionable show, but in respectable language he speaks his piece—learned and rehearsed—inviting people to the "amusement which is exercise," and the "exhibition which is educational." What a commendation from the lowest quarters. "These pictures have all been censored, no vulgarity and nothing indecent, even the most fastidious mother can enter here with her children and not be ashamed."

Such is the agreeable and polite language of the "barker" today. Not only is the campaign for the "educational" being waged from the top down, but this change shows tendencies to improve from the bottom upwards. What a pleasure it is to know that the vulgar and indecent no longer pleases, the harvest of nickels and dimes is no longer reaped in the unclean and vulgar resort, but in the respectable, intelligent, morally satisfying exhibition, which gives a clean laugh, a healthy amusement, and a vigorous enjoyment; may the tendency be still upward!!

THE CORONATION.

In an American paper an account of the coronation might, if written by an American, be somewhat prejudiced; if written by a Britisher it might be biased; if, however, it be written by an Americanized Britisher there is every reason to expect that it may be true and impartial. The advance films of the coronation are not satisfactory; there is nothing especially pleasing, consequently nothing of deep interest. As a spectacle it is not what was expected, and unless we get some pictures giving more details, these films are not destined to become more than musty historical records. Another drawback to the advance films is that (no doubt due to extreme haste used) the titles are misplaced, making the descriptions untrue and misleading, only those possessed of the knowledge of English customs know whereby they can rightly interpret the pictures for themselves. King Edward VII funeral pictures were especially valuable in those details which the present coronation pictures lack. May it be, however, that when the later pictures come they shall cover present deficiencies and impart that interest eagerly awaiting the film record of the first coronation since the coming of the art of cinematography.

Oliver C. Pike, the well-known English cameraman, who has scored such marked success in taking moving pictures of bird life, writes thus interestingly in a British trade journal:

"Despite the fact that the resources of Nature have been drawn upon pretty freely in the past, I do not apprehend any difficulty in devising new subjects in this direction in the future.

"It will, of course, be readily admitted that the majority of Nature subjects have been obtained. But Nature is such a vast field, and there is so much variety even in different pictures of the same subject that neither the resources of the photographer with the moving picture cameraman in search of something new, nor of Nature itself will ever be exhausted.

"I have photographed the same birds dozens of times, but in fresh surroundings, and the movements of the birds make a new and what you might call an original picture each time. The wild creatures in Nature do not work like a machine. Take a dozen thrushes, for instance, there is as much variety in them when you attempt to photograph them as you would find in a dozen children.

The photographing of birds with the kinematograph has as yet only been touched upon. In the future, perhaps, more will be done in this direction, yet so vast is the field open to the bird kinematographer in this country alone that he could employ the whole of his energies for the whole of the time at his disposal without exhausting the resources of even our own small kingdom.

Then there are the foreign birds, and here I may add that their photography in their native haunts has, as yet, not been seriously attempted. And now it has been made possible to invoke the aid of natural color photography to the kinematograph, think what a wonderful picture may be secured in the tropics of the many species of bird life in their splendor of plumage amidst the beauty of natural foliage.

The public will never be tired of pictures of wild birds. A bird appeals to a person as much as any creature in Nature, and when some of the hidden scenes of Birdland that can be seen only in a state of nature by a few are brought onto the screen, they will always be welcome."

By CLARENCE E. SINN

It is coming to pass sooner than I dared hope. Good musicians are being commissioned to arrange the music for some of the better releases of films. Witness the Pathe Film d'Art "Il Trovatore" and "Faust," recently put forth; and now comes the welcome news that the Milano Film Company has motiographed Dante's "Inferno," with special music arranged by "Signor Carvaglios, composer of some note" (in Naples, Italy).

Some time ago I prophesied that the future would bring such a condition of affairs, but it seems to be much nearer than I imagined. At present these embellishments are being confined to a few of the more pretentious pictures, which is but natural. May we have reason to hope that all pictures will be more pretentious than they now are, and that in the near future? Yes. Think of the immense strides forward that have been accomplished by producers and actors in the last two or three years, and doubt if you can that the once disparaged "picture-show" is soon to occupy a high plane musically as well as dramatically.

An important factor has entered the field, viz: the moving picture critic; one who criticizes pictures, not from the standpoint wholly of a dramatic critic, but from the standpoint of moving picture producers as well as spectators. There is a difference in the two positions, and the intelligent comments made by gentlemen who are taking the trouble to study this difference are no doubt playing an important part in the development of the picture.

On the other hand, the criticism of music for the picture cannot exist in the same degree, for the reason that this branch has not reached the stage where it is worthy of real criticism. I am not intending to cast reflection upon the performers; I am referring to conditions. Imagine a musician sitting down before a critical theater audience to "dope out" music for a play he has never seen (or heard of, possibly), and whose nature he has to guess as the play progresses. What would be the probable result? Not very satisfactory, I opine.

Suppose, in addition to this, he never had any previous experience in this line, but had to rely entirely upon guess work as to what might or might not be appropriate to the subject before him. Yet this is exactly the position of the majority of moving picture musicians to-day. Those who are trying at all are doing the best they can under adverse conditions, and the fact that they accomplish anything at all is worthy of commendation. Some few obtain results that are really remarkable. (This may be applied both ways if you wish).

When music is to be composed or adapted for a theatrical production, the man who is to do this work is usually called for a consultation with the stage director. He often attends one or more rehearsals if expedient, and sometimes is given the manuscript to read. A set of "cues," with explanation of the situations and suggestion for their musical setting, is given him if he does not prepare these himself. Every opportunity is given him for a thorough understanding of the nature of the play, the kind of music required, where to put it and why. Of course, he is supposed to have the technical knowledge requisite, or he wouldn't get the job, so he already knows much of the "where and why."

Dramatic music has its reasons for being and its traditional lines, which are pretty well defined. I should say "theatrical music" rather than "dramatic," for it enters into forms of entertainment other than the drama. How much of this is due to custom it would be difficult to say. Of course, the whole idea of music accompanying a play is artificial, but so is the play (vide Webster: "Artificial—contrived by art or by human skill"). Now, whether we have simply grown accustomed to it, or whether it just "naturally ought to be that way," certain it is that some situations or actions or dialogues are given certain forms of musical accompaniment. It is an established fact that these do not "go" so well without as with the music. The higher forms of drama require little or none; melodrama usually requires much. A "dumb act" falls flat without music. Pantomime, being a play in dumb show, would lose half its interest if given without music. Pathetic scenes are often intensified by a strain of soft plaintive music. Noisy and turbulent scenes can often be worked up to a higher climax by the addition of music of similar character, and many times the introduction of "creepy" stuff in mysterious scenes is as valuable as is the proper handling of lights. Both are accessory to the effect.

Unnatural? Certainly it is. "Art" in this sense is something opposed to nature. The juggler wants the leader to "keep time" with him in certain places; the acrobat wants a lively accompaniment by the orchestra or band, and that crash on the bass drum as he falls into the net. Of course, falling into a net couldn't possibly produce such a sound, and nobody imagines it does, but experience has taught them that these things help to make their acts "go."

All these things are traditional, but they are the result of the cumulative efforts and trials of centuries—since Monteverde first introduced the pizzicato and tremolo in descriptive dramatic music—and I believe their reason for being is a psychological one. I do not believe the use of dramatic or descriptive music is due altogether to the fact that people are accustomed to hearing it and therefore expect it. In fact, there are many times when the accessories are not noticed or realized by the spectator; he carries away with him a memory of the general effect only, and music can be made an important factor at times in producing this effect.

Talking about the future of music in this work, I wonder what will be the future of "sound effects." Will they be eliminated or elaborated? I think they will be very much elaborated. We know the lecturer adds to the understanding and consequent appreciation of the picture and it is, therefore, fair to presume that when the "talking picture" is brought to the required perfection it will be the one best bet. Here and there is found a spectator so esthetically inclined as to enjoy his pictures better in silence, but the majority of people like to hear something. Hence the theater manager employing "Lily Limp Limpwrist" and "Percy Fuzzyhead" is apt to fare better financially than if he gave a perfectly silent show. This may not be true in every locality, but I believe it would hold good in most of them. For this reason I believe the better way to answer the vexing question of accessory sounds is by improving their quality and not by cutting them out altogether.

Of course, it does seem absurd to see the lips of the actors moving in soundless speech and hear a dish fall with a crash. In this essential pantomime differs from the photoplay. The pantomimist does not pretend to speak or even move his lips. Ideas are conveyed by gesture and facial expression alone. The sound effects as made by the use of inanimate objects are heard of course. I will admit this is quite a difference; we see the actor talking in the photoplay, but do not hear him. We see a railroad train approaching and hear a part at least of some of the sounds it is supposed to make. The baby falls out of bed and makes a noise like a horse falling from a house, but the shriek of the terrified mother is inaudible, although she must have made the greater noise of the two. It is essential that these inconsistencies be reconciled in some way, and I think it will be along the line of a greater number of and more truthful sound effects (including speech).

How about several classes of picture houses with all the "high brow" stuff in one and all the horse play stuff in another. You could then choose your form of entertainment for the time and know where to find it. You might see a first class drama given with every word and sound audible. With correct music and other accessories. You could see pantomime if you wanted to. The lovers of the purely silent picture could be accommodated, providing there are enough of them to make such an enterprise pay. We could have high comedy, low comedy, vaudeville, burlesque, and musical shows each in its own "canned drama" theater. We could see—

Oh, wake up! This hot weather must be going to my head.

Mr. Thomas Bedding asks us to state that he is no longer connected, either directly or indirectly, with the Associated Motion Picture Patents Company, of 1482 Broadway, New York City.

QUESTIONS ON LAST WEEK'S LESSON.

1. What is the critical angle?
2. Explain, in detail, how it acts.
3. At what point is it passed?
4. What qualities must a good lens possess?
5. What is meant by the refractive power of a lens?
6. Upon what do the optical properties of glass depend to a considerable extent?
7. What is refractive index?
8. Of what is white light composed?
9. What is the dispersion and what is the dispersive power of a lens.
10. What glasses are commonly used in lenses?
11. Why are they used?

LESSONS ON LIGHT (Continued).

If a ray of light be passed through a plain prism it will be, as is generally known, split up into its primary colors. Lenses are nothing more or less than a series of prisms, each with different angle and base, as shown in Fig. 30.

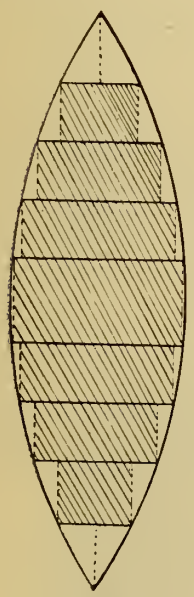

FIG. 30.

In this illustration you must, in imagination, obliterate the glass between the side lines of each prism until the ends of the side lines meet at one point, which gives you the real angle of each successive prism. On Figure 30 the glass represented by the shaded portion is of no optical use whatever. It is merely a carrier for the prisms represented by the unshaded portions. As a matter of fact, while shown quite large, to illustrate the idea, the prisms are of almost minute smallness, the lens surface being made up of tiny prisms, each but the size of a pin point.

You will, by this process, see that, starting from top or bottom, each successive prism has less angle until at the exact center a point is reached where the sides are exactly parallel.. This point is the axis of the lens. But to return to the manufacture of lenses for a moment. The discovery and working out of new glasses and the general improvement of lenses has been an exceedingly costly matter. The difficulties encountered have been tremendous. The use of certain components require that the glass be not heated beyond a certain very definite point barely sufficient to allow of the materials being thoroughly mixed. If heated beyond this point the very components whose presence is necessary to success are votalized and escape in the form of vapor. Some of the most useful modern glasses cannot be kept heated to the required temperature for sufficient time to allow all the bubbles in the "metal" to rise to the surface, hence, though a perfectly homogeneous glass of this kind can be made, it will invariably contain a few air bubbles. There are certain glasses with valuable properties which cannot be used except they be cemented between two other glasses for the reason that the surface is subject to deterioration through action of the air. It may amaze the average reader to learn that certain kinds of glass will tarnish, or rust almost as readily as will iron. One of the interesting operations of glass making for optical instruments and lenses is annealing; a process requiring much time to complete. It is absolutely essential that the annealing be properly done or the glass is of no use in lens making. If glass in its molten state be allowed to cool too rapidly its outer surface will harden more rapidly than its interior, the consequence being that, through contraction, pressure is put on the mass within. The result is a glass having uneven density. It, of course, follows that its outer surface and inner mass will have different refractive powers; also there will be constant strain present in the glass which tends to give a crystalline structure, in a measure destroying the perfect homogenity of the glass. The method of avoiding all this is called annealing. It consists of very slow cooling, carried out in ovens, the temperature of which is allowed to gradually decrease, so that the whole mass becomes solid at the same time. In the case of large discs the process may require weeks, or even months, to accomplish perfect annealing.

In some condenser lenses there is a tendency to discolor under the action of heat. Pink or purple is the usual tone of color found. This not only signifies that a portion of the light is being stopped, hence lost, but also the more serious fact that the ray is being robbed of one or more constituents going to make up a pure, white ray of light. The best light cannot, therefore, be had through such a lens. Color may be an inherent defect or may be the result of deterioration. In condenser lenses it is usually the latter, being due to the presence of an excess of some metallic constituent, presumably lead.

Small air bubbles in a lens do not necessarily do harm, but the presence of veins is a serious defect. They signify imperfect preparation or handling of the glass in its molten state. Such glass is not perfectly homogeneous, hence will not give the best results. These defects are frequently met with in cheap lenses. In high grade lenses they are not found, since they would reject the lens or place it in the cheap class.

I am sure it will be of distinct interest, as well as of some value, to describe the process of grinding lenses. It will give the operator some idea of the delicate nature of the article he is handling, perhaps inducing better care. Many operators, not comprehending the extreme delicacy of a lens surface, are exceedingly careless in handling the same. I have seen operators wipe objective lenses with coarse cloth, and even waste, applying considerable pressure. Every time this is done the projection is bound to suffer. It may be the result is not bad enough to be readily perceptible to the naked eye, but it is there just the same and repeated abuses will, in time seriously injure the projection—the sharpness of definition. That lens surfaces must be absolutely true and that very little is required to disturb this accuracy, will be better understood through description of the making process.

To grind a glass disc some material harder than the glass is employed, in powdered form, such as emery, sand or diamond dust. The glass is rubbed against a metal tool, or mould, of the desired shape, with the grinding material between the surfaces, so that the glass is gradually made to assume the shape of the tool. That an evenly ground surface may result, the movement of the glass, as it is pressed against the tool, must be irregular. If the glass be held stationary a series of circular grooves would be plowed, leaving a corrugated surface. It is therefore necessary that it be given a motion similar to moving a ball in a socket. Glass grinding tools are cup-shaped, concave or ball-shaped convex metal tools, usually fixed to a glass grinding lathe. They are made in pairs, one concave and the other convex, so that each pair can be ground together to keep the curve true, and for every different curve to which a lens is to be ground (and their number is legion) a special pair of tools must be made. In order to construct a pair of such tools, say of six inch curvature, a brass gauge is first made by turning in a lathe a disc and ring, of brass, measuring exactly twelve inches across (six inch radius). The cup and ball tools are now turned to fit these gauges as accurately as possible. They are then ground together with emery until they fit one another exactly. They are now spherical curves and are tested by an instrument known as a spherometer, which registers the curvature. If the curvature is not correct at first trial it is returned and re-ground until exactly the desired form is attained. These tools are for rough grinding and such exceeding care is not exercised in their making as is accorded those required for the more delicate operations of fine grinding and polishing to come later. The grinding process consists of gradually shaping the glass to the exact contour of the mould. Coarse emery is first used, until the approximate curve is attained, then finer emery, in connection with more accurate tools, until the surface is smoother and more exactly fits the contour of any, made to attain the exact curvature required. The process of grinding, as above described, seems simple enough, but as a matter of fact great skill is necessary to produce a true surface. The motion given the glass must be as irregular as possible else more will be ground from one part than from another. For spectacles and very cheap quality lens work (I'm afraid projection lenses come under this classification to some extent) which require but a moderate degree of accuracy, automatic machines can be used, in which the motion is conveyed by means of a crank, but no automatic machine can even approach the requirements necessary to produce a good optical surface. Good lenses depend for their accuracy upon highly skilled labor and are accordingly expensive. A particular skill of touch is attained by the best men; a certain grip indicates whither or no the tool, during grinding, is equally in contact over its entire area, and tells how the surface is progressing. If curves are very convex as compared to their diameter, they are ground singly. If the curves are slight a number may be worked together in a block. Such lenses as spectacles, whose curvature is usually slight, are made in large blocks of maybe fifty or one hundred at a time, but most lenses used for photography, and many short focal length projection lenses, must be ground singly or in small blocks.

Interesting Experiments.—Mr. D. L. Van Leuven, Bakersfield, Cal., writes: "I wish to contribute a few lines, in the hope it will be of some benefit to brother operators. I am a constant reader of the World, especially the Department, and wish to thank you for the help it has been to me. In my last letter I promised to send in the results of certain experiments, then under way, with different carbons and different amperages. My experience has been that, when A C is used, a very low voltage at the arc gets the best result. It is, however, a very difficult matter to pull 70, 80 or 90 amperes and have only 30 to 35 volts at the arc. When using resistance wire you will find that if you cut out some and raise the amperage, thus your arc pressure will be too high and there will be much noise. When you cut in the resistance you don't get the light and—there you are. But I have known 45 ampere arcs to make more noise than others pulling 75. In a recent test I discovered a new way to lower the voltage, viz: by use of an extra rheostat made of 100 feet of No. 10 B & S gauge bare copper wire. With 100 amperes flowing (this heats the wire, but not to hurt. It adds a resistance of .21 of one per cent. for every added degree of temperature) the copper resistance decreases the pressure by 20 volts. There will still be plenty for the other rheostat of six coils, each containing 16 feet of No. 8 B & S Climax resistance wire, to do. The copper rheostat, the climax wire resistance and the arc are all hitched in series. Hitched up thus the ammeter showed 86 amperes at the arc. Now, brother operators, don't imagine this will work out the same in all cases. Your transformer, or the mains themselves, might be overloaded. At my house the voltage is 114. When my full load is on it pulls down to 109, which is about right. And now to the experiments: The following tests were made while using the before described resistance arrangement. Tested G E volt and ammeters were used. All carbons were cored. A C current, 5/8 Arco; with 86 amperes, arc voltage 32; excellent light, but hard to control. 7/8 Bio, 91 amperes, arc voltage 32, extra good light, large crater, clear field; light easy to control. 3/4 Bio, 86 amperes, arc voltage 34, extra good light and easy to control. Hooked in more resistance and with 75 amperes, 7/8 Bio carbons, arc voltage 44, had poor light. With 5/8 Arco carbons, 73 amperes, arc voltage 38, had good light and good crater. With 3/4 Bio, 75 amperes, 36 volts at arc, had good light. Hooked in still more resistance, and with 5/8 Arco , 62 amperes, 34 volts at arc, had fair light. Still more resistance and, with 5/8 Arco, 50 amperes, arc voltage 38 had poor light. My throw is 86 feet; 16 foot picture. I use two 7½ condensers, one a concave and convex and the other convex on both sides. I like them better than the ordinary plano-convex condenser lenses. I also have an idea for an outside shutter. This shutter gives about 15 per cent. more light than the ordinary three-winged article in common use. They give about 47½ per cent of the light, while this one gives 65 per cent. Also it can be used successfully with 60 cycle A C. It must be made very accurately, however, or it will cause flashing, just like the others, on A C, 60 cycle current. The transparent wing must be shaded and colored exactly right or it won't work well. The precise shade can only be ascertained by experiment. I tried many times and came near giving up in disgust before I finally struck it right. The idea is that the transparent wing must be frosted just enough to kill the travel ghost, but at the same time let enough light through to even up with the other light spaces. I found that sometimes a very little tinting with very light red or blue would help. Here is an idea I have not as yet seen set forth in the Department: A rubber elastic, such as you can buy in any drygoods store, one inch wide, or wider, makes the best takeup belt I have ever had experience with. Of course special pulleys are necessary, but they are easily and cheaply made. It is also excellent for motor drive belt. It is easily adjusted and, by use of an idler, eliminates all, or very nearly all, takeup tension trouble.

I am sending samples of carbon stubs used on heavy amperage—the 7/8 on 91 amperes, also picture of my operating room. Bakersfield has no poor operators working at present. Projection in all houses is extraordinarily good. We are organizing an operators' and stage hands' union, I A T S E, of which I have been a member for some time. Will have charter soon. Yours for good projection, and prosperity for the Department."

We cordially thank Brother Van Luevens for setting forth the results of his experiments. Personally I cannot just see why there should be a difference in effect between the copper wire resistance and the same amount of resistance in climax wire; also rheostat resistance for A C is costly and not good in any way. A low-voltage transformer (Economizer, Inductor, etc.) is the better form of A C arc regulation. As I see it, however, your experiments simply show that the higher the amperage, carbons being increased proportionately, the better the light. Instead of all that resistance in series, why not use multiple connections? Possibly, however, there is, as you say, some advantage in elimination of noise in that particular form of resistance. I confess I cannot see why it should be so, however. The condenser you use is the common form in England and Germany. It has advantages, but is costly if one breaks many. The "convex on both sides" is called a "double convex" lens and the other a concavo-convex (also, if I rightly remember, a meniscus). The shutter, if it works O K, is great. If you can really project a sharp, clear, white picture, free from flicker, travel ghost and halo, with a shutter cutting only 35 per cent. of the light you have contributed a decidedly valuable discovery to the art of projection. But, frankly, Neighbor Van Luevens, I am skeptical! If you knew the number of things along these lines, which have been tried out and discarded, you would understand my hesitancy in accepting this as gospel until I have first seen it in operation. The trouble with translucent shutter wings is that, while they eliminate the travel ghost, blot out the image completely while the film is moving, and all that, they must, to serve the purpose intended by the translucent shutter, pass a certain amount of light. They cannot, of course, pass it except in diffused form. The light must be broken up completely, else we have the travel ghost and—there lies the trouble. The diffused light rays cannot be confined to the screen! The practical result is that you get a halo of light around the picture, which spoils the general effect. This may be, to some extent, counterbalanced by outlining the picture in dead black, but even this does not entirely eliminate the trouble. Also, where translucent shutter wings are used and the halo deadened by black, the picture, instead of being clear white, in its high lights, is a grayish color. Now, friend Van Luevens, I am simply setting forth known facts. If you really have made some discovery which overcomes the difficulties named you might send on a shutter and I believe I can do something with it for you. But, before sending a shutter be very sure that the faults named are in no degree present. As to the elastic belt idea, it "listens well," and ought to work all right. The 7/8 carbon craters are well formed and as large as the average 25 ampere D C crater.

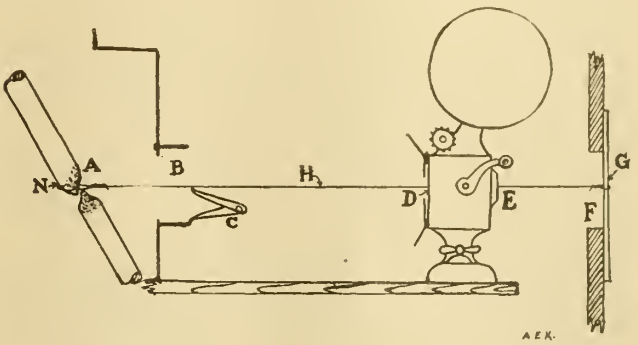
Wasted Labor.—During the past week the Editor was called upon to examine a new projection machine, the invention of a man who has worked long and faithfully in its perfection, besides sinking close to $1,000 in the model, experiments, etc. It is with positive dread that I approach such a mission, for it is almost a forgone conclusion beforehand, what I am going to have to say. The gigantic error made by nine out of ten who enter the inventive field, as applied to projection machines, is that they have little idea of what has already been done. They do not realize that the machine manufacturers are constantly experimenting, and have been, some of them for years, constantly seeking for improvement. The cost of experiments made by one company alone, to my personal knowledge, amounts to thousands of dollars every year. These experiments are made by trained men, having every facility at hand. As against this what chance has the individual, working without adequate facilities or capital, of perfecting an improved projection mechanism? He may evolve an improvement of some one point—yes. But to be able to enter the field with a complete mechanism enough better than the established machines to be successful in pushing its way to the front, is quite another matter. The neighbor who sent for me had but one single point in his mechanism which was new, and that was a minor one, though very good. Even it may have been tried, I do not know; but I have heard of nothing like it. I was confronted with this proposition: If I smoothed the matter over by being noncommittal the brother would be encouraged, possibly, to expend still further time and money. This I would regard as purely a waste. If I told him the plain, unvarnished truth, as I saw it, I would in all human probability lose his friendship and possibly even make of him an enemy. In such a matter there was, to my mind, no choice. He had asked my opinion. Disagreeable as was the task, I gave it. It was an extremely unpleasant thing to have to do, under the circumstances. I am telling you of the incident as a warning to others. When you get the inventive bug, the very first thing you should do, is search diligently and see what has already been done along the lines you are working. To discover all that has been tried out is sometimes well nigh impossible, but go as far as you can anyhow. I thoroughly approve of the operator using his brains and experimenting for improvement. I do NOT approve of his expending much time, labor and money, however, without first trying to see if the same idea has not been already tried and discarded.

Lining the Machine.—La Harpe, Ill., writes: "Can you describe method of lining up the lens, condenser, aperture and arc? My picture is a bit brown on the left side and I think the lens is not exactly in line. How about it?"

The fact that your picture is a "bit brown on one side," does not necessarily indicate out of line trouble, LaHarpe, though that would be a possible result of that condition. Examine the following: (a) The screen itself; (b) See to it that your carbons are exactly in line with each other sidewise, so that the crater faces squarely to the front, instead of to one side ; (c) Make certain that all lenses are perfectly clean. On page 421, Feb. 25th issue, will be found complete directions for lining the machine, lenses, etc. For the benefit of new readers I will re-print same: "Lining the Machine.—Mr. Albert E. Kirk, Galveston, Tex., contributes the following: 'Here is an arrangement for bringing the arc lamp, condensers, aperture plate and objective lens in one accurate straight line with respect to each other. It is, or should be, a well known fact, that the very best results can only be obtained with any projection apparatus when the various parts composing its optical system are in one direct line or axis. Many of the complaints made by operators of "ghosts," unevenly illuminated screens, shadows, blurs, distortions, etc., can be traced to this cause. The method here given is purely a mechanical one, and is infallible.

" 'In the drawing A is the arc lamp, B the circular opening in the lamp house for supporting the condensers, but with the condensers removed. D the aperture plate of the machine, E the front plate with the objective removed, F opening in wall of booth, C shows method of applying calipers.



" 'To line up the machine, remove the condensers from their mount and objective from machine head. Procure four or five feet of rather fine spring steel or brass wire, and make a loop at one end. Hook this loop over the carbons exactly where crater on positive carbon is formed, closing the carbons sufficiently to prevent wire from slipping off. Pass wire through condenser opening, aperture and objective opening, on through opening in wall and draw up tight winding the free end as shown at F. The wire can be made still more tense by backing up the arc lamp a little by means of its focusing screw provided for that purpose. Now, by means of rule or calipers, center wire in objective opening at E, sliding stick F up, down or sideways until accomplished. The tension on the wire should prevent the stick F from slipping out of place. Next, center the wire at B, raising or lowering arc lamp to accomplish this. It may be necessary to adjust both B and E simultaneously to gain the best results. When satisfied that B and E are absolutely centered, examine aperture opening, and if everything is O. K. the wire should pass accurately through its center, as may be tested with the calipers. Most likely, though, this will show 'out,' in which case the machine head should be moved bodily until all openings are directly central with respect to arc lamp. No attention should be paid to opening in wall of booth, as this has nothing to do with lining up of the machine itself. If it is known about how far apart the carbons are drawn when running the lamp regularly, a small notch could be filed in the upper carbon at N, directly opposite the crater, to hold the loop in the wire, and then the carbons drawn apart to their working distance when making all the above measurements.' "

Condenser Focus.—Canton, Penn., writes: "Having been subscribers to the World and enthusiastic readers of the Department and the Handbook for several months, we would like to ask a few questions concerning our own theater. We have an Edison machine and 110 volt direct current. The length of the throw is fifty-four feet and the picture is eight by ten. The arc ordinarily pulls about 35 amperes, although it can be increased as high as 100 if it is ever necessary. The films are commercials, none being newer than one hundred days. What size condensers do you think suitable for this work? How many amperes should be used? How long should Edison brass sprockets wear, with moderate use? Could an electric fan, located back of the arc—although not directly back—affect the light? Is it necessary to have the idler rollers adjusted in any special way?" You have about a five-inch objective lens, and two 7½ inch condensers ought to give best results. Try two 7½ and try one 7½ with a 6½. Use whichever gives best results. As yet I have been unable to find any rule for condenser lenses applicable to all cases. Generally speaking, however, two 7½ condenser lenses should give best results for working with objectives of more than 4 or 4½ inch E. F. See remarks on condensers in my answer to another letter this week. You can project a very good ten foot picture (10 feet wide), using an ordinary cloth curtain, with 25 amperes D C, but for myself I would use more—say 35. I very much prefer a brilliant picture. With a mirror screen, or with a metallic screen, the latter being properly made, 25 amperes should be plenty. As to length of life of Edison brass sprockets, I cannot answer that. It would depend on too many things. For instance: the life of the lower sprocket would depend on how tight you kept your take-up tension. Yes, a strong current of air will effect the arc, particularly with D C, since the D C arc is comparatively long. Also a fan located so that it blows into the lamphouse (from what you say I assume you have the back of your lamphouse open) will very likely cause excessive condenser breakage. Yes, your idlers should be set about twice the thickness of a film away from the sprocket. Too close or too far away is very likely to cause trouble.

Wants To Act.—Taunton, Mass., writes: "Will you please tell me where and how I can obtain a position as motion picture actor?"

The correspondent signs himself "A Young Handsome Man," which ought to help some, anyhow. No, Taunton, I cannot. You will first have to get in touch with some one of the many producing companies and convince them of your ability. Most motion picture actors have had considerable, some of them very much, experience on the regular stage. Unless you have experience, or extraordinary natural ability you will be wasting time, I am sure, trying to enter ranks of the moving picture actors.

Several Things.—Chicago, Ill., writes: "Foregoing unnecessary and trite remarks, such as being a 'constant reader of the World and your Handbook,' I will hold myself to the questions in hand. Obfuscation No. 1 is that of condensers. According to the laws of refraction and dioptrics, rays emanating from the focal point of a lens will become parallel after passing through it. Or, conversely, parallel rays, such as those from the sun, will come to a focus at the focal point of the lens after passing through it. Assuming that we will, or desire, to use a 4½ inch condenser lens at the back, and remove the crater of our carbons 4½ from the condenser we will get parallel rays. If our crater is further emoved we will get converging rays, and if closer, diverging rays. This fact, if you grant it correct, will determine the focal length of our back condenser. Applying this same rule to our front condenser, i. e., that parallel rays will come to a focus at so many inches from the lens according to the refractive power of the lens, we have but to determine the desired distance we wish to have the front condenser removed from the focal center of the motion picture lens. If this is ten inches, then a ten inch condenser will give the desired effect. This must be considered in the light of possibility, also taking into consideration that this same distance of focus can be attained with widely different condenser focal lengths. This seems to me, however, a very unscientific mode of procedure. Having noted many and various methods of choosing condenser lenses, I found that the combination of 6½ and 7½ predominated, with the lamphouse, that is, condenser mount, removed about 12 inches from aperture. Methinks this would work out in this way. Granted that we are using a 6½ inch condenser for the back and a 7½ for the front, and the distance from condenser box to focal center of M. P. lens 12 inches. Removing our crater 6½ inches from back condenser the rays emanating therefrom would be parallel, and after passing through the front condenser they would come to a focus at 7½ inches from the front condenser. This would not give us the desired effect. We therefore move the crater closer to the back condenser. The result, an increased length of focus from the front condenser, but also diverging rays emanating from back condenser. We continue until we obtain the desired spot, thus placing the front condenser more and more at a disadvantage, since not only must it bend the divergent rays parallel, but in addition converge them to give the desired result. This seems to me impractical, and unscientific. Your comment on this controversial subject is awaited with pleasure.

No. 2. I am using a Chicago Stage Lamp in conjunction with a Powers head. As you probably know, the Chicago Stage lamp, as some others of similar make, change the angle of the carbons in relation to the condensers by a rod which at the same time serves to distance the carbons from one another. I have also noted that the Motiograph lamp has the rack bars set at a greater angle than the Powers, or possibly any other make, and that this angle is maintained whether the carbons are short or long. This shifting of the rack bars with the Chicago Stage lamp becomes imperative as the length of the carbons changes. Is this change due to the difference of length of the upper and lower rack bars? I have also noted that in the Motiograph lamp that the lower carbon (D. C. current) need not be set as much in advance as with my lamp due to the angle. Can I change the principle of my lamp to that of the Motiograph. Is the angle due to the position of the crater in relation to the back condenser? It struck me that it is, also that its change becomes imperative, due to the consumption of the carbons. Why not also with the Motiograph?"

Your conclusion, Chicago, regarding focal length of condenser lenses, would be correct but for one thing, viz: You must remember that rays from the crater diverge. Hence it follows that the further the crater is from the 4½ inch circle of the rear condensing lens, the less number of the light rays will reach the lens, and the greater number will be wasted on the interior lamp house walls. To use a 4½ inch back lens, setting the lamp at such distance as would send the rays from that lens in parallel lines, and a front lens of focal length to give the proper spot at, say, 12 inches, would be an ideal condition in theory. In practice, however, a considerably increased percentage of the light would not reach the condenser at all and the extreme thickness of the back lens would induce excessive breakage. More than this, with the use of lenses of short focal length and consequent heavy curvature, the factor of spherical aberration becomes very pronounced. Without figuring the thing out or experimenting, I do not believe a practical combination, giving the results you describe, could be had. You must remember that the two lenses cannot be considered alone, or separately. We can only consider the E F of the combination.

As to the lamp matter: It is two years since I have seen a Chicago Stage Lighting Company lamp. The hook limiting the angle on the Powers lamp is to comply with New York City rules. It is, to my way of thinking, merely a nuisance. A hacksaw will remove it in two minutes and you may then give the lamp all the angle desired. By means of the up-and-down adjustment, the endwise and sidewise adjustment of the Powers, Motiograph, Edison or Edengraph lamp, the arc is readily kept in exact center with the condenser, regardless of how the carbons burn. I do not remember as to the C. S. L. Company's lamps up-and-down adjustment. The angle of the carbons should remain the same until they are consumed. Tilting the lamp to secure up-an-down adjustment is NOT good practice. The carbons are, or should be set with the one, single idea in view of having the crater face the condenser as squarely as it can possibly be made to do, keeping in mind the fact that, if the angle be too great the lower carbon tip will interfere. Changing the angle of the lamp changes the relation of the crater to the lens, which should be constant throughout.

Throw.—Los Angeles, Cal., writes: "Am making arrangements to incorporate a company, with a view to put in a line of amusements. Will you kindly inform me how far a motion picture machine can be made to project a picture? Also what, in your opinion, is the best make of machine?"

The question you ask is difficult to answer definitely. It is not a matter of the machine itself, but of lenses and light-loss. As the focal length of the objective lens is abnormally increased, the focal length of the condenser must also be made greater. This necessitates the moving back of the crater further from the back condenser lens, with consequent loss of illumination. Also, where the extreme distance between objective lens and film, in very long projection, must cause some loss. However, up to say 150 feet, you will encounter no difficulty whatever, provided the atmosphere be reasonably clear. As to the machine, it is not the province of this Department to compare goods made by different manufacturers. The handbook, $1.50, for sale by Moving Picture World, will give you much information in concrete form along these and other lines.

English Publications.—Chicago writes: "Will you kindly give me the addresses of the two leading London magazines devoted to the moving picture business? Also I would like to know the subscription rate charged when taken in conjunction with the Moving Picture World. I have a copy of your Handbook and consider it worth many times its price."

The Kinematograph and Lantern Weekly, Tottenham Street, Tottenham Court Road, London, W., and the Bioscope, No. 85 Shaftsbury Avenue, London, W., are the two leading London publications devoted to moving picture affairs. Their price, in conjunction with the Moving Picture World, is $7.00.

Answer to New York.—Chattanooga, Tenn., writes: "Regarding the letter 'A Puzzler,' page 1375, June 17 issue, I take it for granted the brother was using a lamp. I had the same difficulty and the only way we found to eliminate it in part was to keep the carbons very close together, set the carbons about the same as for D C, giving the lamp about the same angle as that of the Edison lamp. I decided the fault lay somewhere in the lamp, for the reason that when I used an Edison lamp and lamphouse I got a perfect spot."

You are wrong Chattanooga. It was not the lamp you suppose, but an Edengraph, set at about the Edison angle. The trouble was not in the lamp. Of this I am positive, for I personally examined the outfit. Nevertheless we are indebted to you for setting forth your own experience. I did not name the lamp for the reason that, your surmise being incorrect, it would not have been fair to do so.

Lens Trouble.—Williams, Cal., writes: "Have changed my location. Sent in change of address, but have not received paper. Please look matter up as I miss the 'World' very much. I have three projection lenses. The smallest gives me a 9-foot picture at 54 feet. Picture is sharp except for slight ghost in center. The next size gives a 10-foot picture, but it is out of focus at one side and the ghost is more pronounced. The third will not project a picture at all on my Motiograph No. 1, but gives fine 13-foot picture on the Optigraph No. 4. I have lined my machine by several methods, but still one side of the picture (the right-hand side) remains out of focus. I have a new way to line the machine. I remove tube from lens jacket, fit a piece of pasteboard into the end of the jacket, finds its exact center and punch a small hole. I then tie a knot in a small wire, or thread, pull it through the hole, take it through to the crater, making a loop to fit around the carbon-tip, move the lamp back until the thread is tight and with callipers or rule center the aperture with the line. I bought this house from the party who owns the local light plant. The dynamos are overloaded and they will only allow me to pull from 12 to 15 amperes. I use about 15. If I draw more I pull down the dynamos. Have had several rather heated disputes with the manager of the plant. He claims that before I took the house they projected a 13-foot picture 54 feet with 8 to 12 amperes. This is D. C. I have had considerable experience with A. C., but D. C. is new to me. I can't do what he claims to have done and don't think it possible to get even a fairly good picture with 12 amperes. I notice you have said 20 to 25 amperes and think you are correct. Am using two jars of water with lead plates as resistance. Is there anything better? Can one use the same rheostat on A. C. and on D. C.? The pressure is 220 volts and I have a 110-volt rheostat. Can I use it? If I move the lamp back the picture is much brighter, but the ghost is larger and white; also the title letters string like they would were the shutter not set properly. If I move the lamp up close the lettering is perfect, but the picture is dark and the ghost is dark instead of white. If I draw 20 amperes I can almost take the ghost out, but I can't do that or they will cut off my service. Is the trouble in my condenser? What size should I use? I have used the same condensers on 10-foot picture, about the same throw, with plenty of alternating current and everything was fine."

Your order to change address was not received. Have attended to the change and you will now receive the paper. Your smallest lens is about a 6-inch E F. The next size is about a 5-inch E F, while the last is approximately 4-inch E F. Possibly the last named strikes the shutter before it is back far enough to focus, though I thought all models of the Motiograph would take a 4-inch E F lens. If the ghost is more pronounced in the second lens than in the first you might try shorter focal length condensers with it. First, however, try moving the whole lamphouse further back. Probably that will eliminate the ghost. You say that one of the lenses gives a picture out of focus on the right side. Try turning the lens half way around. If the out-of-focus effect is then on the left side look for the trouble in the objective lens itself. Possibly some of the balsam has melted and run down between the two factors of the front combination. Your method of lining is all right, but differs very little from another way we are re-publishing this week. In using either method the lamp should be moved up or down, and sidewise until the string is precisely centered in the condenser mount. A good way is to make a wooden model the exact size and shape of a condenser. It can readily be shaped out of soft wood. Bore a half-inch hole in its exact center. Place the model in the mount just as you would a lens, pass the string through the hole and attach to the carbon. Move lamp until string is exactly in center of hole and then center aperture by moving machine and center back end of lens barrel (removing aperture to do this) and you are through. It is necessary, first of all, however, to see to it that the lamphouse sets square with the machine. I have seen lamphouses setting a quarter of an inch further to one side at the back than at the front. This means that, to center the light on the aperture the crater must be to one side of the center of the condensing lens, thus placing the condenser at decided disadvantage. As to the matter of amperage: it is quite possible that the former owner projected a 13-foot "picture" with "eight to ten amperes of current." I can project with five amperes, but what kind of projection is it? If the gentleman can project a 13-foot picture that could, by any stretch of the imagination, be called even half way good, with that amount of current, he is indeed a wonder. There isn't another like him in all the world. To project a really good picture, according to my standards, of that width, you would have to use at least 25 to 30 amperes of current with an ordinary bleached muslin screen; somewhat less with a mirror or metallic surface curtain. I am inclined to believe that your ghost is at least partially due to the shadow of your lower carbon tip. With that exceedingly small amperage you will get better results using one-half inch cored carbons above and ⅜ solid below. Get the solid carbons medium soft. If too hard the light will be yellow. No, you cannot use a 110-volt rheostat on 220 volts. Is the dynamo a 220-volt machine or is it a three-wire system? If they can supply you with 110 volts it will require far less electrical energy for a given amperage. Twenty amperes at 110 volts is 2,200 watts. Twenty amperes at 220 volts is 4,400 watts. The surplus is taken up in your resistance, but it works the dynamo just the same. In other words, your 15 amperes at 220 volts takes precisely the same energy from the dynamo as 30 amperes at 110 volts pressure would. As to the movement of the lamp back and forth causing travel ghost (strings from the letters, as you call it), that is a new one on me. I have known travel ghost to result from moving the arc up or down excessively, but not from moving it straight forward and back. Your lamp should be set at a distance from the condenser which gives a spot just covering the opening in the gate, with maybe an eighth of an inch to spare at the corners. If that does not give results look elsewhere for the trouble. If you have got to use 220 volts, confining yourself to 15 amperes, better purchase a 220-volt, 15-ampere rheostat. If the rheostat you have is a 110-volt, 25-ampere one, it is likely that two of them in series would reduce your current altogether too much. You could cut out coils, however, until you got what you wanted. I would suggest that you send in $1.50 for one of our handbooks, by myself, which will explain many things to you. Send the money to the Moving Picture World.

An Outrage?—Boston, Mass, writes: "Can you tell me how many ways there are of ascertaining voltage. A man recently took the State police examination for an operator's license. The above question was asked, among others. He gave the following methods: by using a voltmeter; by connecting 110-volt lamps in series; by phoning the power house, by spacing of switches and fuses; by the way the resistance is used—series or multiple, and by inserting fixed resistance in the circuit, using an ammeter and multiplying the two. He was refused a license because he could not tell another way. You thus see what an operator is up against in this State. If you know of any other practical way of ascertaining the voltage, I would appreciate the information."

The tag on incandescent lamps and stamp on nameplate of meter, if any, or transformer, if any, would be two other methods. It is almost unbelievable, however, that any board would refuse license on such grounds. In fact, the thing is so utterly absurd on the face of it that I am compelled to believe the real reason for refusal lay elsewhere. If, however, the board really did do such a thing it was an outrage, pure and simple, and if it were I, I would take the matter into the courts so quick it would make the heads of that board swim. Spacing of the switch bars or fuses is no proof of voltage since a 250 or even a 500 volt switch may be used on 110 volt current. Very frequently 220 volt switches are used on 110 volts, also 220 volt fuse blocks. The house may have used the higher pressure and changed to the lower. It would be sheer idiocy to change the switches and fuse blocks. The lamp test is entirely practical and is amply sufficient for safety. If one wishes to know his exact voltage, a volt meter is, of course, the thing. The editor of this department is thoroughly in accord with the proposition of limiting license of operators to really competent men as soon as is practical. He, however, is most decidedly not in sympathy with refusal of license to men except for good and sufficient cause. As a general thing, examiners have been too lax, rather than too strict, and only occasionally has there been real ground for complaint. We believe the real cause for refusal of license was other than the correspondent believes it to be.

Combination House.—Every succeeding summer sees an increasing number of the deservedly popular "airdomes" in operation. Many theaters abandon their regular auditorium to camp in a vacant lot alongside, more often than not amid more or less ugly, uninviting surroundings. Many houses close entirely, re-opening in the form of an airdome, perhaps a considerable distance from and in an inferior location to their regular theater.

The writer sees no really good reason for all this. The airdome idea is most excellent, since it provides amusement for the people in open air, instead of inside a sweltering theater, in air contaminated by odors arising from hundreds of perspiring bodies.

There are, however, objections to the airdome. Bad weather renders a shut-down necessary, while sunlight precludes any possibility of early opening. In summer 7:30 p. m. is as early as the airdome can hope to open, while on bright days it will be eight o'clock, or even later, before there is sufficient darkness to allow the projection of a really good picture.

The writer has given this subject considerable thought and sees no good reason why the summer open air theater and the winter house cannot be combined in one. He believes that could be done without excessive, much less prohibitive cost. He believes that by such a plan, rightly and intelligently carried out, practically all the advantages of the airdome may be had while, at the same time, retaining the advantages of the comfortable seats, decorations and curtain of the regular, winter theater. The construction cost would be considerably higher, true, but, as I have said, not excessively so.

To accomplish this it would only be necessary, so far as the walls be concerned, to carry the roof on pillars (of brick, concrete or steel), between which could be fastened, in some convenient manner, removable panels. Such panels could be made of fireproof construction, of considerable thickness and light enough to be handled without undue labor. All this is entirely feasible and practical, though the details would have to be carefully figured out, of course.

The roof could be made removable in several ways, but the most feasible plan consists of a sloping roof, the upper half of each side made to slide down over the lower. The New York City Madison Square Garden has such an arrangement, though built of glass, and very heavy. This scheme has the advantage that in case of rain the roof may be quickly closed and the performance continued without interruption.

I am only merely outlining, roughly, the idea as it appeals to me. Details are quite another matter, but, most certainly, there is nothing impossible or impracticable in the scheme. The one really valid objection to the removable roof idea is the fact that, to obtain the full benefit, the audience must actually see the sky. This would preclude the use of an ordinary ceiling, unless it, too, be made removable, which would probably not be practical.

KINGS HIGHWAY AIRDOME.

Charles Letts, proprieor of a particularly successful picture theater in the Loth Building, Amsterdam Avenue, New York, has opened an airdome at Kings Highway and 14th St., Brooklyn, N. Y. Best Licensed pictures will be shown, with a change of program every evening. One thousand seats of comfortable character have been installed and every device intended to give comfort to patrons is included in the equipment. As a special bid for the patronage of men, smoking is permitted. This is said to be the finest equipped airdome in Greater New York.

POWELL SELLS THE IDEAL.

Adolph Powell, founder and proprietor of the Ideal Theater, at Kokomo, Ind., has sold that house to Mrs. Gypsy Lillard-Jones, who took possession July 1st. The Ideal has been in operation for two years and is very popular with local picture patrons. The purchase price is said to have been $6,600. Mr. Powell advises the Moving Picture World that he is in the market for a suitable house seating not less than 350.

Mr. H. F. Truelich, of Chicago, Ill., has arrived in New York and will remain as the New York representative of the Exhibitors Advertising Company, who are having great success in their new enterprise.

Comments on the Films

Licensed.

"The Price of a Man" (Edison).—Here is a somewhat melodramatic story of a man wrongfully accussed of a crime making his escape from prison, befriended by a widow whose home is about to be taken from her under foreclosure proceedings. He gives himself up to the parson that the reward may be given to her to save her home. The man is proved innocent and freed. This play gives a decided tug at one's heart strings. It is a very worthy play, convincng and effective.

"Swat the Fly" (Essanay).—A farcical comedy based upon the plague of flies. McSwatt does some fancy swatting before he regains his senses, and much furniture and other property is injured during his brief but mad career. But ultimately peace is restored and all goes well. The audience laughs while the run for flies is in progress, however.

Scene from "Jimmy Elopes" (Gaumont).

"A Hungry Pair" (Essanay).—Shorty and Skinny appear once again in this picture and give a good imitation of men who want something to eat. The only difficulty is Shorty failed to perform his part and when Skinny begins blowing the whistle in the restaurant for the purpose of being arrested by Shorty. Shorty has fallen asleep and real polcemen lead the offender away. The comedy is short, but is lively and good.

"Saving the Standard" (Gaumont).—The principal feature of this picture is the cleverness of the girl who succeeds in eluding the sentries and secures again the standard which the victorious prince has wrested from her very hands. The conqueror discovers his loss, but before he can rally his men the defeated duke's soldiers arrive and the prince is driven away. The settings are picturesque and the expedition of the girl into the conqueror's apartments while he is feasting is a thrilling bit of work which brings applause.

"The Cuttle Fish" (Gaumont).—An interesting and instructive film. The fish is first shown in pursuit of its prey, the prawn, and later the water is shown clouded when the fish itself is pursued by an enemy. The work of securing a film of this character must have been considerable, and that it is well done is well understood from previous pictures of this type from the same house.

"The White Medicine Man" (Selig).—This comedy is based upon the Indian's well known belief in occult powers. Here a magician is represented as visiting the Southwest, and the Indians believing him capable of performing almost anything, kidnap him to effect a cure for the chief's daughter. He resolves to resort to mesmerism. The Indians appear much mystified by his apparently supernatural disapperance. The film is of unusual interest.

"The Cattle Herder's Romance" (Kalem).—In this cowboy romance a couple elope and are married without parental consent. They take up their abode in a little cabin. Later another cowboy is brought in badly injured. The woman is introduced as the sister of the young man. The injured man falls in love with the woman, which creates a bad complication. As soon as he is ready to leave he is invited to make tracks along the trail. Chagrinned, he goes to the nearest town and almost the first thing he sees is a reward offered for the discovery of the couple. The girl's father has relented The grouchy cowboy leads the sheriff to the cabin only to find that the father sends her a note asking them to return to the ranch, where a pardon awaits them.

"Trading His Mother" (Edison).—This is a delightful story of a very human small boy whose mother is a pretty widow. The mother won't marry again unless Donald will consent. It takes a new gold watch to buy his good will, and when his mother and the stepfather are away on their wedding journey, he gets lonesome, and the watch doesn't any longer seem valuable. The ending makes a very pretty picture. He has written a letter telling his stepfather that he needs his dear mother and that he can have the watch back, and falls asleep. The mother and stepfather come in and find him and the letter.

Scene from "Jimmy Elopes" (Gaumont).

"Polish and Pie" (Edison).—This is a slight but very amusing picture. Mr. Brown brings home varnish in a whiskey bottle and the new cook finds it. This new cook is very well played. She uses the varnish in making a pie. After she has taken the pie into the dining-room she drinks what is left in the bottle. The varnish seems to taste good, but it quickly makes her feel very uncomfortable inside. The family has meanwhile begun on the pie and there are wry faces in the dining-room.

"Ancient and Modern London" (Urbanore).—These views of London are all taken from the Thames. The cameraman seems to have passed down the river taking the Houses of Parliament and the palaces and other buildings down to the old Tower of London. We see the two towers of Westminster Abbey and the dome of St. Paul's. These are very interesting and welcome pictures.

"Boys Will Be Boys" (Eclipse).—This is a film made after a pattern quite common on the other side. Boys play pranks and are chased by policemen and others. The film made several people laugh.

"In the Northern Forests" (Vitagraph).—Here is a picture which stirs the emotions. It represents an escaped prisoner giving up his freedom to save a lost child from destruction by wolves in the depths of a forest whither she has wandered. The same child had given him a cake on the train when he was being taken to prison and he hasn't forgotten it. He is captured by the sheriff and his posse and returned to prison, while the child goes with her parents. The people join in thanking the prisoner and declare that they will endeavor to secure his pardon. It is well, perhaps, to call attention to the fact that the sheriff takes his prisoner back. There is no mawkish sentimentality here. He has transgressed the law and though he may have performed a brave and noble deed he must go back and make reparation. That the people will petition for a pardon seems perfectly right. The principle of justice, of punishment for wrongs committed, is not set aside, which is the important feature. Entering into the spirit of the picture it seems hard, yet it is perfectly just, and the teaching of the film is proper.

"The New Cook" (Kalem).—In this film we see the cook discharged and a young man seeking a daughter's hand thrown bodily out of the house. The young man assumes a cook's disguise and secures the vacancy. All would have gone well, only he objected to having the ice man remove a large piece of ice and put in a smaller one. In the fracas his wig comes off and he is revealed. Just then the old cook returns and pleads to be taken back, which is done. Then the daughter and young man plead with the father to allow him to return. And the father relents. It is a lively comedy and through most of its length is diverting enough to satisfy.

"The Woes of a Wealthy Widow" (Vitagraph).—This is a very amusing comic character play in which the character stars of the Vitagraph Company have parts. This company does this sort of thing exceedingly well and, though this picture is not so good as "Captain Barnacle's Courtship," it is praiseworthy. The last suitor's three harumscarum girls do very creditable work also. The original lover, Bunny, while this suitor and his girls are inside, eaten up by suspense, is seated on the steps outside. When they are shown out he takes hope again. There's a very amusing final scene when the widow appears and Bunny comes into his own.

"To the Aid of Stonewall Jackson" (Kalem).—This is a thrilling and beautiful picture showing the courageous ride of a pretty Southern heroine with important news of a proposed Union attack on Gen. Jackson. The first scenes are at the girl's home. Though it is summer, there's a fire on the hearth. The Union forces arrive and Gen Shields makes the house his headquarters. The girl climbs from her beautifully furnished bedroom down a pillar of the porch and listens to Gen. Shields's commands to his officers. She then climbs back. One feels that such a young lady would hardly have been been able to accomplish this unaided. Her ride to Jackson, 100 miles away, is through a very beautifully pictured woodland. She has an exciting adventure at an inn, but reaches the Confederate general, and we catch a glimpse of a fierce battle in the distance as a closing scene. This last picture is very creditable. The picture is for the most part intelligently conducted and very commendable.

"The Crucial Test" (Edison).—This fine picture is taken from Davis's "The Derelict." It is commendable on nearly every point, for it tells the story of a noble action; it pictures in a suggestive way the naval battle of Santiago, of which we get glimpses through the tug captain's binoculars, and is both well conducted and well acted. It is also instructive as showing something of how a war correspondent does his work. The Cuban backgrounds are also interesting. It is sure to be very popular.

"Along the Danube River" (Pathe).—Perhaps no river in the world is more interesting than is the Danube and we have had too few pictures of it. These photographs of castles, towers and villages are clear and very welcome indeed.

"Obedient Limbs" (Pathe).—This is a trick picture, but what the audience sees is startlingly unexpected. Among other things, this magician sends his leg on a journey to kick his enemy. We see the leg leave, do this little service in good shape and return to its master. It is short and slight, but commendable.

"Chinese Potteries" (Pathe).—This is an unusually interesting and instructive educational film. It is very well worth while, for it shows Chinese potters at work making and decorating pots and porcelain figures.

"Tested by the Flag" (Vitagraph).—Miss Story makes a pretty heroine for this very melodramatic love story. The early scenes are in New York. The heroine pictures very well her difficulty in choosing between the two lovers. One is a lieutenant and is ordered on duty in the Philippines, where he leads an infantry charge against a gatling gun. The other stays at home and is accepted by the girl. He evidently doubts the depth of the lady's sentiment for he steals the hero's letter to her which says that he is on his way home. For some reason he also hates the flag. The hero returns and proves him a villain. He is compelled to kiss the flag and then is dismissed. The gatling gun scene is thrilling. The villain plays up to his part most villainously and the picture is likely to be popular.

"A Village King Lear" (Gaumont).—This is a very intelligently produced picture of a tragic incident. It doesn't seem as effective as it ought to be. It is an extremely difficult situation to picture adequately, for the bitterness in such an old man's heart at being ill-treated by his two daughters, to whom he has given everything he owns, needs words to express it. The village Lear has to sit in judgment on himself and his daughters before he can feel all their sharp-toothed unkindness. These are things that cannot be expressed by gestures alone. The acting is very good, but though the picture is interesting, it doesn't get across powerfully.

"His Birthday" (Lubin).—This is a very pretty picture indeed. The wife intended buying new furniture for her husband's office to be a birthday surprise. She didn't make this quite plain, so the spectator didn't know what she and her husband's clerk were doing with the book that they had —it was a furniture catalogue. The rest of the picture is quite clear and very pleasing. The acting is also pleasing.

"Foxy Izzy" (Lubin).—This is a slight, but very amusing character comedy. Izzy is a Jewish necktie man, a Cheap-John, but he had enough brains to get back the roll of bills that the tramps stole from him. The spectators seemed to enjoy it.

"The Wonderful Eye" (Biograph).—This is a picture of a mean trick, but the sharp-practice sale of the glass eye by the two actors isn't convincing. The plight of the stranded theatrical company is pictured very convincingly.

"Stubbs's New Servants" (Biograph).—The situation pictured in the film is comical, but not uproariously funny. The trouble with it seems to be that some of the scenes that had comedy when first pictured were repeated without adding anything to the fun. This was due to poor acting. The play lasted longer than the fun in it. There is no company that puts out better dramas than some of the Biograph plays, but its comedies seldom come up to the best.

"A Craven Heart" (Selig).—Here is an exciting drama, with a fire and a rescue from a window, a fall from a broken ladder, with one man left clinging to the upper portion. A count interferes between a young countryman and his sweetheart. She and her people, flushed with pride at her being loved by a nobleman, give their consent. Before matters have proceeded far the count's wife appears. As a rsult, there is a fight between the count and the young man and the house is set on fire. The fire is the spectacular scene in this film and as may be imagined, is somewhat exciting. The rescue scene is realistic enough to satisfy the most ardent apostle of realism.

"The Snake Bite" (Lubin).—This Western seems very weak. There's a bad, hard-drinking character on the ranch. For some unaccountable reason he cuts the girth of the heroine's saddle and with the horse at a stand she has an unconvincing fall. This leads to a duel. The shots are fired and the villain falls. Everybody supposes that the hero has killed his opponent, but they can find no wound on him, and find that a snake, till then hidden, has been the cause of his death. This is very undramatic.

"At Break of Dawn" (Essanay).—The background of this picture is Mexico and it tells the story of an American surveyor who marries a Mexican girl. Called to his home office she hears nothing of him for five years. A Mexican who has loved her all these years discovers the husband with an American woman in the vicnity and hastens to tell her. Taking her little one, she rushes out to see for herself, when she is overtaken by an earthquake, or some other cataclysm, and falls to her death in a crevice in the earth. The picture closes with the Mexican weeping over the body of his sweetheart, which he has drawn from the crevice into which she fell.

"Always a Way" (Lubin).—Here is a comedy detailing some of the adventures of a couple when the girl's brother, a minister, refused his consent to the match. An elopement was planned, but it was nipped by the minister's returning unexpectedly. But after Harry was led away by the constable for breaking into the house and Ruth had escaped they dressed as Indians, went to the minister and asked to be married in the Christian way. After the ceremony was performed they removed their wigs, disclosing their identity to the astonished brother.

"The Two Lives" (Selig).—This is neither a story nor a drama, so much as a dramatic sermon. It contrasts two lives and except for the characterization of the different players there is nothing in it that hasn't been used often. Of two college friends, one becomes poor and has to begin at the foot of the ladder in a foundry. The other lives for money, becomes rich and unhappy and then failing, goes to the dogs. The poor man, now prosperous, helps him. The photography of the foundry scenes is so poor that very little idea is given of what goes on in a foundry; these pictures are not so good as the untouched photographs of such places that an advertising man sees. The other scenes are very well photographed. Most of the actors played squarely into the camera. Yet the picture is undeniably interesting.

"The Latent Spark" (Vitagraph).—This is no comedy, but it was produced under the comic masque. It's the story of a tramp who "stowed away" on board a ship and proved so worthless that he was put ashore at Hong Kong, China. Chinese roughs insult the Stars and Stripes and the sailor pitches into the whole crowd and gets knocked out badly. His old shipmates passing see his plight and carry him back to the ship. Some spectators may be surprised and delighted at seeing Bunny as a fat Chinaman. The Hong Kong scenes are very well produced and the play is interesting. It isn't up to the Vitagraph's high standard.

"Love and Cheese" (Pathe).—This latest adventure of Max kept several in the audience laughing clear through to the end of the picture. But Max has been funnier than in this picture, where he is shown as carrying, without his knowing it, a piece of cheese to his own bethrothal party. He knew there was a bad smell around; everybody did, but he didn't know what caused it, till he took off his coat and it forthwith began its journey home, Max following in shirt sleeves.

"Mt. Etna in Eruption" (Pathe).—This is a marvelous film. It brings one closer to a volcano in eruption than most would care to go in the body. It shows the craters and the hot flowing lava. Of course, the great trouble with such pictures as this is the smoke. A photographer can hardly get behind it; but we are shown here an astonishing amount of what actually takes place. It is a film more than usually worth while seeing.

"Marvels of Horsemanship" (Edison).—This commendable film was taken by permission of the commandant of the Fifteenth United States Cavalry, Col. Joseph Gerrard, and gives a good idea of what the cavalry can do on a horse. Some of the feats are thrillng and all are interesting. The closing portion of the film, showing the evolutions of the entire company, is more than ordinarily interesting.

"Mustang Pete's Love Affair" (Essanay).—Here is a Western film giving some of the comedy incidents at Snakeville, where rival boarding houses sought trade. The project of sending for a pretty girl to draw a crowd had the desired effect, but there was, of course, trouble, which ended in a fake duel and the flat failure of Mustang Pete to win out in his contest for a woman's heart. As a character sketch the film is a success.

"The Picture on the Screen" (Gaumont).—This is a love tale in whch a young man sees in a motion picture a girl that interests him and he followed the lead until he finds her. Then he obtained a position as actor with the same company. Ultimately the mother withdraws her opposition to the match and after the wedding they learn that he is wealthy, thus ending a pretty romance.

"A Ragged Coast" (Gaumont).—A film showing breakers and wild waves along the Catalonian coast is given here. Included in the pictures are views of some of the oldest Roman ruins in Spain. The work is done with care and there is about these scenes a sense of wildness difficult to describe, but none the less effective.

"The Old Folks' Sacrifice" (Vitagraph).—Here is a picture that will suggest many things to the thoughtful. Perhaps others will pass it without much care regarding it. It tells how two old people sacrificed all their savings which they had accumulated to purchase a home to save a ne'er-do-weel grandson from prison. The sympathy of the audience is clearly with the old people and some comments heard by this reviewer were not very complimentary to the young man. Perhaps this is sufficient proof of the power of the picture.

"Temples of India" (Eclipse).—Every one of these travelog films is welcome. This one, showing several of the temples of India, can be criticised only as giving us too little, but everyone will agree that it gives much more than our money's worth. It shows a very interesting picture of a procession in which the ashes of Buddah are supposed to be carried.

"The Free Lance" (Eclipse).—A mountain bandit captures a young girl. Because he falls in love with her, he frees her and gives himself up to the police. This incident is dramatically told among beautiful scenery, probably in Sicily. The film has one particularly beautiful picture of a small lake with a village beside it. The acting is by no means poor, but it isn't good enough to make the picture important. It is acceptable and interesting, however.

"The Trapper's Five Dollar Bill" (Edison).—This comic-character play is taken from one of O. Henry's stories. The setting is in Kentucky mountains and the story is of a mountaineer and his wife, who have a five dollar bill and can't agree on spending it. The squire gets it in the end. It is a very amusing picture and there are some fine scenes in it, too, especially one of a fine yoke of oxen.

"The Jealous Husband" (Biograph).—Here is a picture of a husband who feigned ill health to enable him to get away on a fishing trip with the boys. He sees his wife riding with the doctor and this awakes his jealousy so much that he decides not to undertake anything of that sort when he wants to get away in the future.

Independent

"When Pals Quarrel" (Powers).—Here is a Western picture which has a scene of jealousy, two murders, with the wrong man accused in one instance and considerable more business of that character to distinguish it. The film is saved, however, by some clever work on the part of a horse which accuses the right murderer. Ultimately the picture works out to a wedding and a peaceful living, but not until the fiery trials of the principal characters make one think that the world is all bad.

"The Love Potion" (Powers).—Here is a bit of comedy which has for its basis the sickly sentimentality of a young man in a boarding house, where his attentions to the young women disgust them. He discovers an advertisement of a love potion which, when mingled with the food or drink, will make the person thus affected fall madly in love with the one nearest. The girls learn the young man's scheme and induce an actor to dress as a woman and act the part of falling in love with the man. The result is that he is driven out of the house by the ridicule heaped upon him.

Scene from the Eclair masterpiece "Jerusalem Delivered."

"The Fighting Rev. Caldwell" (Champion).—Here is a Revolutionary picture which has been told in some detail in books, but never as fully as here. It is an episode in the life of Rev. Caldwell, the fighting parson of Springfield, N. J., whose wife was wantonly murdered by the British and tories and who afterward led his people against their foes. The accessories are all there. The blunderbusses and muskets in the pulpit, and the constant fear of armed foes, and the measures for protection which were required. Then comes the cruel murder and the rush of the minister and his people to the chamber of death, with the baby girl weeping her heart out by her dead mother's side. "Give 'em Watts, boys," said the parson as he distributed hymn books among them for wadding for their rifles.

"The Emperor's Debt" (Ambrosio).—This is one of the Ambrosio Company's Napoleon pictures. It is a story of a conscript. We see him depart and when he writes home, as line by line the letter is flashed on the screen, a picture follows, illustrating it. He writes, for instance, that he saved the Emperor when a powder barrel blew up, and we see the explosion and see him jump before Napoleon. He returns to his home badly wounded and finds his widow-mother unable to pay the taxes and in danger of losing the cottage. The Emperor chances to pass through the village and helps the soldier. The army scenes are like others that have appeared in other pictures of this series. The picture, though very interesting, is not important.

"The Message from the West" (Nestor).—The chief merit of this film comes from excellent acting and almost perfect photography; but these are not the only qualities that commend it. The hero of the story is not heroic, but he is the victim of grinding poverty, and when he reaches the West he makes good. His case is one that demands suspension of judgment. The young man who acts the part makes a remarkable portrayal of the situation and keeps our interest strongly from the beginning. The poor wife, who is left to shift for herself and the baby, is very heroic. Just before help comes to her from a rich uncle she faints at the washtub. The play is skillfully conducted, and the end very pleasing, the father joyfully reunited with the young mother. The picture is notable for the number of distinct, individual types that it shows. It is very commendable.

"Golden Rule" (Reliance).—Good characterization makes this picture fresh in spite of the triteness of its subject—the common marital difficulty. The pretty, young wife flirts with her husband's friend. The husband orders her out of the house. Finally their child brings the two together again. There is much that is new in the conduct of the picture and many of the scenes do not lack beauty. Most of the players, we believe, are new in Reliance pictures. They do very commendable work.

"Jim and Jack" (Great Northern).—This is an animated photograph of two acrobats who are very clever. They have a manikin and a life-sized wooden mule which is used to increase the fun.

"A Cowboy and a Lord" (Champion).—Here is a Western picture which shows the love affairs of a cowboy, a lord and an American girl, and the cowboy wins the contest. The girl is kidnapped and carried away by two Mexicans, but the cowboy follows, shoots one and compels the other to give her up. When the lord proposes she makes it known that she loves the cowboy, even though her mother has just told him she is already engaged to the lord and has sent him away. However, the lord, when he learns the true state of affairs, is man enough to go after the unfortunate cowboy, inform him of the situation and bring him back. The running fight when the Mexicans are taking the girl away and are pursued by the cowboy is thrilling and there is applause when the girl is rescued.

"Starting Something" (Solax).—A lively comedy professing to be a travesty upon "mind cure," or mental suggestion. A number of people sample the contents of a bottle and all are told that they must continue dancing because the bottle has been poisoned. After half a dozen are engaged in this vigorous exercise, the fact that the effect is owing merely to mental suggestion is discovered and the dancing ceases. It is very funny while it lasts, however.

"Fate" (Rex).—This can hardly be called an optimistic picture, though the man who is in the toils seems to deserve all his troubles. He is being bled by a blackmailer and has no more money. In an interesting dive this blackmailer pulls a revolver and is shot by the man in self defense. The man goes to prison. We then see that his wife has married again; she seems to think him dead, which is somewhat bewildering. The convict escapes over the wall and later seems to be compelled to become a burglar. His own little girl finds him in the house. She is not frightened and apparently recognizes him as her father by firelight. She was only a baby when he saw her last. He doesn't know her; she tells him who she is and shows him his picture. This recognition is also bewildering. He is discovered with the child by her step-father and kills himself. The man covers the face of the body as his wife comes down the stairs. It has dramatic scenes and is well acted, but it is not very convincing.

"Blacksnake's Treachery" (Bison).—This is another of the Bison pictures devoted wholly to Indian life and customs. It is a love story, very interesting and very artistically conducted, and finely acted as well. One can find no fault with it. It has some feature riding, but even this is skillfully knit into the whole and heightens the final dramatic impression.

"The Silent Signal" (Solax).—The silent signal is given by the smoke rising from a fire over which a blanket is alternately held and lifted. By this means the heroine of the story warns the U. S. cavalrymen that one of their comrades, her lover, is in danger of being killed by her band. This brings the boys to the rescue on the gallop. The Indians are too plainly not real; they are white men with close-fitting jerseys. The soldiers ride well. It is a fairly interesting film.

"For the Queen's Honor" (Imp).—This is a thoroughly romantic picture of a court intrigue. The king (played by Owen More) is good-natured and unsuspecting, though the queen is plainly beginning to think too much of one of the courtiers. The queen's sister (played by Little Mary) is aware of this and saves the queen by taking her place. This deceives the king, but he requires that the villain and the queen's sister be maried. She loves another courtier and the terrible situation is very well pictured by Little Mary. The villain turns out to be heroic and sacrifices himself. This saves the situation. For a romantic play, it is effective and commendable.

"The Little Wayfarer" (Itala).—This is a poetic picture in which two boys play the leading rôles. The poor one, the wayfarer, is hungry and asks the rich boy for some bread which he is feeding to a fine St. Bernard dog, but is refused. The rich boy is brash and falls into the lake and the poor wayfarer saves him. He shakes hands with the rich boy and his parents, but will accept no reward. He thanks them and after his clothes are dry departs on his way under the blue sky. The play is effective, being well acted, save in one or two short incidents.

"The Court's Decree" (Thanhouser).—The court's decree, in granting the husband a divorce, was that he should have the custody of the child (Little Marie Eline). This story tells how the mother, frantic with love for the child, attempted to kidnap her and how she was foiled by a clever lady detective, and how she and her husband were reconciled. Little Marie Eline's acting is very popular, and this is not surprising. In this picture her playing is remarkably intelligent. The Thanhouser Kid has genius. The other parts in the picture are well acted, of course. It is a very commendable film.

"The Schoolma'am of Snake" (American).—Here is a lively Western comedy telling of a proposed kidnapping to be followed by a forced marriage, which did not work according to schedule. A schoolma'am has two cowboy admirers. She favors one more than the other, whereat the one who is not favored is jealous and determines to force the teacher into marriage anyhow. It is a good story, well told, with nothing severer than an umbrella fusillade to worry the one who doesn't care for much killing.

"The Ranch Chicken" (American).—Here is a good comedy, containing an illustration of the so-called darkey's desired for chicken. The scare the pair of darkey chicken-stealers got with the ghosts, and the way 'Rastus departs, leaving Dinah to her fate, is funny. The last scene, with the chicken suspended by a string down their chimney and their devout belief that it is a gift of the gods is quite as funny as the rest. The scene is laid among the cowboys and it will keep an audience pleased throughout its length.

"Secret Service" (Lux).—This story represents the attempt of a certain general to obtain documents describing the invention of another general. The lieutenant goes to the inventor's house, falls in love with his daughter and finds it hard to carry out his orders. He sends photographs of the documents, but is sharply informed that these will not do. The originals must be obtained. The chief goes, too, and together they enter the room where the documents are kept. The lieutenant tries to prevent his chief from taking them and is shot dead. The chief departs, leaving the documents. The inventor and his daughter enter the room, see the papers and the dead body of the lieutenant.

"His Great Sacrifice" (Yankee).—Here is a love story which represents a young man giving of his skin to save the beauty of the girl he loves, even though she had, in a way, deserted him. It was a case of a country boy loving a famous actress. She meets with an accident which promises to mar her beauty for life. Her only hope is skin grafting, but when volunteers are asked none of her admirers will submit. The country lover hears of the case and presents himself at the hospital. The operation is successful and when the girl recovers she decides that a man like that is worth having and marries him. The heart interest is strong and there is much in the film to please.

"As a Man Soweth" (Great Northern).—Sermons on the screen are often effective. This one presented in a church or during a lecture would support any argument a speaker might advance regarding the dangers of the downward path or the benefits of the way upward. It is the life history of two separate individuals illustrated. One goes the bad way; the other goes the good way. One spends a portion of his life in prison and ultimately dies in the agonies of delirium tremens. The other becomes an honored man. The closing scene, representing the two, with the ocean of life between, is effective. It is a strongly worked out picture, but distinctly of the homiletic order.

"Turin Military Tournament" (Itala).—This is an unusually interesting educational film. It shows a series of competitive performances in which soldiers, sailors and firemen show their skill and endurance. There's a particularly interesting race over obstacles in which sailors carry a field gun, lifting it at one point over a high wall.

"Thou Shalt Not Lie" (Reliance).—This play of French peasant life gets over pretty effectively. The father, who has disciplined his son for lying, is saved by that son's telling the truth in a perilous situation for him. We see him at the time when the priest has lied to save him, and the son is asked the same question. The son tells the truth and the father is arrested, but the fact that he was truthful really saves his father's life when nothing else would have. It is acted acceptably.

"The Haunted Island" (Powers).—One very foolish "made up" scene comes near spoiling this otherwise effective play. The first scene on board the burning ship is so good that one wonders why the Powers Company ever attempted to "make up" a ship on fire seen way out over the water. However, when that scene is once passed, and the spectators feel the creepy, haunted feeling produced by the pictures of the island, the burning ship scene is forgotten. It took imagination to work out those island scenes. The effect they give is new in motion pictures. There are no ghosts seen, but the whole island seems filled with mystery.

"A Child's Heroism" (Eclair).—This is a pretty tale of the times when even villains had courtly manners and dressed in frilled trousers and wore plumed hats. It is wholly improbable, yet has some interest due to graceful actors and acting. The background of some of the scenes is beautiful. The story tells how the boy's mother was stolen and kept a prisoner in a castle. The boy, like Coeur de Lion's page, finds where she is and rescues her. In the rescue there's a smack of Jack the Giant Killer.

"From Wallace to Grant" (Champion).—Not much care was taken to make the actions pictured on this film seem probable—most of them are quite impossible. Such a film is apt to seem amusing, because it is so far below the best films in interest, workmanship, everything.

"A Gasoline Engagement" (Imp).—The Imp Company has produced so much first-class work that one seeing this film would hardly believe that it was of Imp make. It is a farce with very little real humor in it. The situation seems, for some reason, a little stale, and though the players worked very hard to make it amusing, in most parts it was flat. Some in the audience chuckled now and then as they watched it unrolled. Owen More plays the hero-chauffeur, and Little Mary plays the heiress.

"Cupid in Chaps" (American).—Here is a Western love story which tells of the difficulties of the cowboys at a certain ranch because of the efforts of the hired girl to marry one of them. Later they meet a beauty, take her to the ranch and the foreman speedily falls in love with her. It is assumed that they are shortly happily married.

"Portugese Joe" (Yankee).—This story of brutality and injustice on the seas ends with a murder, the flight of the murderer and the unjust accusation of an innocent man. The Portugese boy, the real culprit, drops exhausted in front of a beautiful house into which he is taken and cared for. While there he learns that the man accused of murder of the mate of the vessel and at one time the boy's champion is the son of this house. The boy then confesses. Through the influence of the family he is pardoned and is given a home with them.

"When a Man Fears" (Thanhouser).—This is a very interesting love story with an unusual climax. The man, threatened with consumption, is sent by his doctor to live outdoors in a tent. He falls in love with a girl who lives on a farm close by. The doctor also chances to fall in love with this same girl, and because he is jealous tells the man that there is no hope of his recovery. In despair he is about to hurry the end by shooting himself. This is the weakest part of a good film. These suicides are not typical, healthy or original. We see too many of them in the pictures. The girl enters in time to snatch the revolver away from her lover and the conscience-stricken doctor confesses that he lied. There are some delightful rural scenes in this picture, including one of a fine flock of hens and chickens, with one self-important turkey. Aside from the one grave fault, it's a good film. It is well acted.

"A Red Girl's Heart" (Bison).—Nearly all the pictures in this series of Bison films of Indian life without white men is very interesting. This story of a woman's jealousy and vengeance may seem to some not quite so good a play as, for instance, "An Indian's Love," but it is clear, dramatic and convincing. It's a commendable film.

"How Aunty Was Fooled" (Powers).—The Essanay Company's release "What Happened to Aunty" might have been made from the same scenario as this picture. The comedy is an unusually good one. When a company releases a picture that so closely as this resembles one released by another company, we generally expect to see an improvement rather than the reverse, as here.

"The Love Tyrant" (Powers).—The love tyrant is Cupid and the part is taken by a pretty little boy or girl with butterfly wings and a bow and quiver full of arrows. The story is what might be called a modern fairy tale, mixing a poetic conceit with realism. Cupid finds two lovers, harnesses them with long, white silk ribbons like a team, and drives them to the piazza steps, arm in arm, and very well content with each other. By this time each is shown full of arrows. After the two are married they have the usual little falling out. Cupid is in despair for a moment or two; but, going out, brings in a charming baby and sets it down on the table between the young husband and wife. The baby comes in smiling, but is frightened and begins to cry. The two comfort him and this ending scene is very pretty. It adds much charm to the picture.

"Baby's Rattle" (Solax).—This little comedy is somewhat spoiled by over-acting. The idea is new to this reviewer and it is worth putting into a play, but to set it in a Mr. and Mrs. Henpeck farce seems a pity. The baby is supposed to have swallowed his rattle. That it was a physical impossibility doesn't seem to relieve the mother's anxiety. Perhaps it would have been better to have supposed that he swallowed only a part of it. The doctor with Xray apparatus is new, and his experiments amusing.

"That June Bug" (Solax).—This play was perhaps suggested by the famous pictures to which Max has the leading part; but it is unquestionably an American play. Though the play does not convince us as a whole, many of its scenes do and are very amusing. Many of the spectators laughed again and again. The policemen at the end seemed unnecessary. They cleared the situation it is true, but spoiled all the real fun. Their presence seemed but an easy way of getting out of writing something that was worth while, something original. The Solax Company players all seem to be intelligent and competent. The picture seems to this reviewer equal to the best of the comedies released so far this week that he has seen. That isn't very high praise.

"The Wrong Telephone Call" (Ambrosio).—This dramatic sketch is convincing, chiefly because it is skilfully conducted and well acted. The banker, ruined by gaming, and in despair, learns through the telephone girl's mistake that a rich lady is sending valuable gems to her jeweler's. He impersonates the jeweler's man and attempts to get the gems, but the lady is too sharp-witted. After she finds him out, she permits him to go unmolested, however; and to show his gratitude when, later, he has become again successful, and sees the lady passing on the street, he quickly buys a bouquet of flowers and has his little girl run with them to her. The scenes are interesting chiefly because the action is not padded.

REX THEATER, AT ABERDEEN, WASH.

Allen H. Dougherty, manager of the Rex Theater, of Aberdeen, Wash., favors the Moving Picture World with an interesting description of that house, which was opened on March 19, 1910. Beginning with the lobby will be found a space 24 feet square, completely tiled, with the tiling forming a wainscot three feet high. French plate mirrors and oil paintings complete the mural decorations. A beautifully decorated box office of tile and prism glass is in harmony with the lobby. A marque extends to the curb across the full width of the lobby. In the auditorium the ceiling is of steel and the walls are beautifully decorated. Smith & Siese patent automatic chairs to the number of 400 provide most comfortable seats. An aluminum screen, which Mr. Dougherty claims is his own make, occupies the center of the back wall. He is very proud of this screen and is willing to back it against anything on the market. A $3,000 Kimball pipe organ sets immediately under the screen.

A well ventilated operating booth, 6 feet by 10 feet, gives the operator plenty of room and good air. A Powers No. 6 projector is installed with other modern devices for good projection. The throw is 90 feet and the combination of machine and curtain gives a picture that can be seen clearly across the street, says Mr. Dougherty.

Large entrance and exit doors, back and front, give a good circulation in the auditorium, aided by four big fans to keep the air moving. The floors are well oiled with antiseptic oil and a porter is kept busy cleaning things constantly.

Chicago Film Brevities

Mr. D. F. Humphrey, president of the Humphrey Company, of Cleveland, Ohio, has recently been in Chicago completing the purchase of equipment for a large moving picture enterprise in Cleveland.

The Humphrey Company is a unique corporation and a big factor in the amusement game in Cleveland. The stock of this large company is all owned by the Humphrey family and all of the officers of the company are selected from among them.

The company owns and operates the largest amusement park in the world, comprising of eighty acres of land along the shores of Lake Erie, in the suburbs of Cleveland, known as Euclid Park.

Among many attractions at the park is a very pretentious moving picture theater, which is run along high-class lines.

Another of the Humphrey Company's successful enterprises is a large artificial ice rink. Under the management of this company this enterprise has always been successful and in order to utilize their building continuously in a profitable manner, they are now installing a high-class moving picture theater which will run until winter.

It is the policy of this company to conduct their business along high-class lines and they have contracted for Kinodrone projecting machine and all the other necessary projecting apparatus and have contracted for one of the "Sunlight" Metallic Cloth Curtain Company's fixed screens of the largest area that has yet been constructed. Size of the screen is 18 feet by 24 feet and will be installed on their special "Standard" frame with tightening device attachment, which will insure an absolutely perfect installation of fabric on this enormous area.

The fine new theater of the Penn Square Amusement Company, 55th and Euclid Avenue, Cleveland, Ohio, will be opened to the public about July 1st.

The building is of strictly modern construction, built as a motion picture theater exclusively.

Mr. Emil Meyer, formerly of the well-known Senate Theater on Madison Street, Chicago, has been selected as manager for the new house and has moved his family to Cleveland so as to be early on the ground and personally look after the final preparations.

Mr. S. M. Hexter, of the firm of S. M. Hexter & Co., is managing owner, which indicates that the theater will be run upon high-class lines.

The latest improved projecting apparatus will be used and first-run films will be used and the pictures will be shown on a "Sunlight" metallic cloth curtain.

The Chicago office of the Moving Picture World had the pleasure of receiving a visit this week from two gentlemen from far away Philippine Islands, Mr. Frank H. Goulette and Edwin E. Tait, of the Exhibitors' Film Exchange, Manila.

FROM EL CAJON VALLEY.

Mr. Jack Richardson, character man of the American Film Company's Western stock, is usually delegated to assume the dare-devil and reckless feats which other members of the company express an unwillingness to attempt on account of the risk to life and limb. In the "Ranchman's Nerve," Mr. Richardson is cast for the character of the desperado, feared and abhorred by the cowmen. In this character Richardson is supposed to be shot. The place of execution was a point of rock jutting out over a cliff having a drop of sixty feet. Upon being shot, Richardson missed his footing and actually fell the sixty feet, which was not intended, suffering a broken ankle and collar bone. But the camera man was on the job and caught Richardson in the film as he hurtled through space to what seemed sure death. Though Jack is still hors de combat, he seems perfectly satisfied since he knows that his sensational fall is in the picture. This fall is the climax to one of the best pictures the "Flying A" has put out.

Another sensational production is entitled "The Outlaw's Trail," which has for its chief incident one which has long been seething in the mind of Allen Dwan, the producer in charge of the Western aggregation. This incident is of great dramatic value and depicts the rescue of a cowboy about to be lynched, through the clever marksmanship of his sweetheart, who is supposed to cut the fatal rope with a shot from her rifle. In this instance, the sweetheart, Miss Pauline Bush, though a good shot, is not quite up to the rope-cutting trick, which is performed by Mr. Morrison, a crack-shot, hidden nearby. Watching for the flash of Miss Bush's rifle, Morrison cuts the rope neatly with a bullet from his deadly "48." Four trials had to be made, however, before the feat was accomplished to Director Dwan's satisfaction.

SOME "SOLAX" WESTERN PICTURES.

While it has not been the policy of the Solax Company to join in the general craze for Western pictures, it is not averse to taking advantage of an opportunity to get something out of the usual line when chance offers. While working on a big military series being taken at Fort Myer, a government post near Washington, D. C., it was discovered that the "Cheyenne Days Company," a troupe of cowboys, had an open week in their engagement with the Orpheum Circuit. Arrangements were quickly made for the cowboys to appear before the "Solax" camera in some of their wonderful feats of riding and rope throwing. The Cheyenne Days Company are Art Boden, champion lariat thrower of Wyoming; Otto Kline, champion bronco-buster; Big Murphy, champion steer thrower, and the celebrated cowboys, Gregg and Earl Hornbrook.

One of the pictures taken shows the training and riding of a wild horse. A thrilling incident in another picture is the rescue of a girl from outlaws by Otto Kline, who picks the girl up from the ground while riding at full speed.

The Elysian Theater, under the control of the Humphrey Company, was opened a few days ago at the corner of 107th Street and Euclid Avenue, Cleveland, Ohio. A splendid program was offered, the features being a first-run of Licensed film and a travelogue on Oberammergau. This program will be continued for the next four weeks. The Sunlight Metallic Cloth Curtain Company has installed the largest fixed screen ever made by them. It was installed on one of their standard frames with a special tightening attachment and is 18 x 24. The auditorium of the Elysium Theater is 270 feet long by 150 feet wide. It has a seating capacity of 4,000. The place is artificially cooled and is always 20 degrees cooler than outside. The attendance on the opening night was of the S. R. O. variety and everything augurs well for its continued success.

"THE CRUSADERS."

Tom Quill, manager of the World's Best Film Co., was seen in the offices of the Company, in the Boyce building, last week. Mr. Quill at present is engaged in giving extensive publicity to "The Crusaders," a four-reel rubject by the Cines Company, of Rome. The World's Best Film Company has purchased outright the United States and Canada rights for the film, which took five months to produce. Nearly 500 people were employed in the production. Mr. Quill is closing arrangements to exhibit "The Crusaders" in one of the large Chicago theaters. Prominent clergymen in the city, of every denomination, will be invited, as well as representatives of the Chicago press. An able lecturer has been engaged for the occasion. The exhibition will be given some time within the coming two weeks. Mr. Quill has already received numerous telegrams from Independent exchanges throughout the country, asking for information as to state rights, date of release, etc.

THAT SET OF DEAGAN BELLS.

Much interest is being shown by exhibitors in the set of Deagan's Musical Bells, which was recently installed in the New York office of the World. Many managers have called in to see what they are like, and as a result, Mr. Deagan is having all he can do to fill orders on time. They are an excellent adjunct to the musical department of any theater, airdome or tent show, as well as being strong for a bally-boo, in places where such a thing is in keeping. Managers who have not inspected these bells should do so at once, or if time is pressing, they should at least delegate their piano players to make a report. The bells are finely nickeled, and nice to look at. They are in perfect tune and simple enough for a child to operate.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

George Kleine announces that his big feature "A Society Mother," which he has been advertising for some weeks for release on July 25th, has been delayed in shipment from Paris and cannot be released until July 29th. The reel which he has decided to release in its place—"A Favoring Current" —"St. Malo and the English Channel"—is one of exceptional merit, especially the dramatic production, which is one of the most perfect stories he has ever released.

ARREST OF SIGNOR CALZIBINI.

The celebrated Italian comedian, Sig. Calzibini, was arrested last week in the Bronx by the New York police while enacting an American comedy for the Rex Motion Picture Company. Sig. Calzibini enjoyed his first ride in an American patrol wagon, accompanied by Senora Calzibini, who was also conveyed to the "booby hatch," dropping large copious tears all along the right of way.

As every one knows, to be arrested in Italy is far from being a joke. Once they get you behind the bars over there in sunny "It," it is one of the hardest things in the world to get out. Instead of proceeding on the assumption that a man is innocent until he is proved guilty, they take it for granted that every man arrested is guilty until he is proven innocent and put him in a cage like a big rat trap. Therefore we can imagine the state of mental anguish in which Sig. Calzibini made his journey, supposing the rigors of American law to be the same as those of his native country.

The Rex Company was acting upon the street, a film to be known as "The Betwitched Shoes," during which Sig. Calzibini was to become entangled with a shoe polisher at work upon the shoes of a customer seated in a chair. When the police arrived all hands were writhing upon the sidewalk in a general meelee, which one of the bystanders thought was a genuine altercation. Sig. Calzibini's anguish descended to the depths of dire despair until he was bailed out, when his disposition took a change for the exact opposite, and which was a desire to celebrate his release and kiss the judge. He did not know that such a beautiful institution as "bail" existed in this beautiful land of the free.

TEXAS AND THE "SPECIAL FEATURE" PICTURE.

The Happy Hour Theater, Dallas, Texas, a moving picture and vaudeville house, has just finished installing the largest exhaust fan in the State of Texas, and may be in the United States. It measures 6 feet 4 inches and is operated with a 4-horsepower motor. Before the big fan was installed, there were 8 ceiling and 8 wall fans in the building and with all of them running at full speed the place was like an oven. The big fan is such a success that all the other sixteen fans have been taken out. The fan runs only 200 revolutions per minute and it does its work well. Very little noise can be heard inside of the building, but on the outside it can be both heard and felt for quite a distance. If any other house has a fan as large or larger than this one, the Dallas managers would like to hear of it. The fan is such a success that arrangements are being made to install a second one in another part of the house.

This section of Texas is being over-run with "Special Feature" pictures. It is hardly a week that passes that one don't show up. The pictures are all right, but the price is always raised to 10 cents. Patrons that go to their favorite place every day or night and when they lay down their five cents for their ticket and they are told the price is ten cents,

Bessie's Ride

Scene from "BESSIE'S RIDE"

WHEN Burton was refused Bessie's hand in marriage, he shot her father, and by a villanous plot accused the successful suitor of the crime. Steve was about to be hung when Bessie found a bit of evidence that revealed the truth, and with it rode like mad to the scene of execution, arriving just in the nick of time to save her lover and obtain the conviction of the real dastard. A picture with plenty of thrill and excitement.

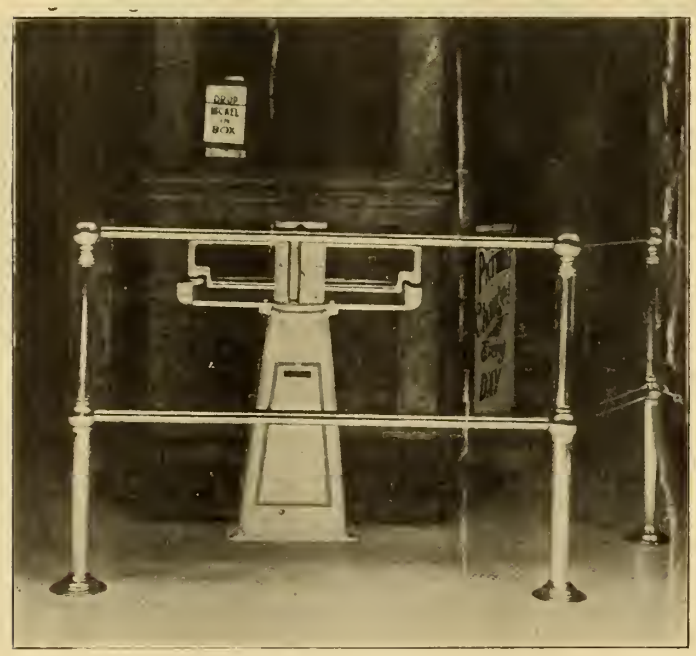
then is the time a howl goes up. Of course the film owners show on percentage and it is not the managers who raise the price of admission, but the patrons don't take it that way. It drives trade away.

Two of the best pictures shown here in many a day are the Melies subject "When Tables Turned" and the Essanay picture of the "Greatest Auto Race." The Melies picture drew more applause and laughter than any picture shown in months. The Essanay picture was a thriller through and through. People got clean out of their seats when the accident was shown. Several women screamed. Auto cranks turned out in big numbers to see it. T. J. K.

ELECTRIC TURNSTILE AND CASH BOX.

Langslow Double Check System.

The Pastime Theater, 441 Market Street, Pittsburg, has shown the usual progressiveness of its owner, F. D. Allison, by installing a new electric device that will, undoubtedly, be welcomed by owners of theaters and parks as a valuable assistant in their checking of receipts. Like the cash register it is bound to fill a long-felt want, and will aid materially the cashiers of the future in that they will know exactly where they stand as to the amount of receipts placed in their temporary custody; too, it will enable them to be relieved any number of times daily, and permit each one to have a check on that portion of the cash for which they, personally, are liable.



Langslow Double Check System.

The initial device is a cash box on the pay-as-you-enter plan, except that by electrical connection it registers each coin when deposited, and simultaneously releases the electric turnstile, again registering the entrant.

While much is claimed for the Langslow Double Check System, on the whole, the mechanism is so simple any possibility of its getting out of order has been eliminated; a novice can set it up and place it in operation. Numbers of them are now on active "police" duty on the elevated roads and baseball grounds in New York City, and it is not too much to expect that they will soon supplant any similar device ever manufactured.

Arrangements are under way in the Middle West for the placing of them under contract, and this territory will be governed from Pittsburg, with George R. Allison, of the Jenkins Arcade Building, in managerial charge.

"The New Congressman," a recent release, embodied several scenes in Washington, D. C., in which society personages appear as an ensemble. The Yankee Film Company arranged with a number of prominent society ladies and gentlemen to appear in this production, among which is an Austrian Countess whose picture appears above. By request, the name is withheld. This simply illustrates the Yankee's progressive methods.

REX NEW POSTER OUT.

First of all, it is an artistic, elaborate poster, prettily conceived, well executed. But that is not the only claim it has to praise. Another fact that takes it out of the general run of posters and sets it off as a thing apart, more conspicuous, and justly so, than the ordinary lithographs of other film manufacturers, is that it embodies the portrait of Phillips Smalley, the leading man of the Rex studio. Both features combine to make it a poster that's a poster; a piece of lithographic art.

Aside from the cardinal artistic merits of the poster, it would attract attention and arouse interest merely because it bears the expressive face of Smalley. For Rex is to be congratulated on possessing Smalley, and Smalley is to be congratulated for being connected with Rex.

It's a great combination—and a great poster!

USEFUL AND ORNAMENTAL.

The two adjectives make the best summing up of the merits of the IMP book, which that ever enterprising concern has issued to its exhibitors. Typographically, it is fine—paper, printing and general make-up being away out of the ordinary. It is a book, well and wisely designed to aid the Independent exhibitor, who by properly introducing it to his audience cannot fail deriving benefit from it. The cost is a matter of cents (three, to be accurate), and is in view of the profits to be gained by means of it, altogether the lowest possible. It is in very truth a business getter and ought to be thrice welcome to the exhibitor in this torrid season.

THE SIMPLEX MACHINE.

The new motion picture projecting machine advertised on the front cover of the World last week will be fully described and illustrated in an early number. Meanwhile an examination of the machine at the office, 23 East 14th street, will be an eye opener to moving picture men. Although many new ideas are incorporated, it appears the Simplex is so easy to thread and operate and so safe to handle that it well earns the title of being "absolutely fire-fool-proof." Mr. Frank J. Cannock, who is acknowledged to be a mechanician without a peer, has laid himself out in the Simplex to create a machine that will make the operator's lot a more happy one. It would be anticipating our descriptive notice to go into details, but we will say that those who are in the neighborhood will be well repaid by inspecting the machine and those at a distance will make no mistake in ordering one.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENT CORRECTED.

Washington, July 8, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World,

Dear Sir: In the July 8 issue of The World, in the Washington correspondence, occurs the statement that "The Leader has the distinction of using the only aluminum screen in the city!" This is not so. I personally know of three theaters and two airdomes using an aluminum screen, and I believe the palm belongs to the airdome men, for, while any fool can handle aluminum indoors, it requires brains to put up an aluminum screen outdoors, to stand all forms of weather without even a lath overhead to protect the surface. Unfamiliarity with the business also leads to the statement that "Reduction of the size of the screen has been an improvement, bringing the figures more to a normal size." The writer last year projected a picture approximately 9 by 12 feet with good results on a white screen, and this summer the picture is 13 by 19 feet, in round numbers. An aluminum surface gives a brighter picture, even with the increased area of the screen, and the comments of the ticket-purchasers are unanimous in favor of the large screen. Too many publicists in the picture game commune with themselves or some pin-headed manager as to what the public likes, and insist on following that valuable (mis) information. And you will note that I am not trying to get a little cheap advertising by mentioning the two places in which I have a controlling interest. Why cannot the writers go down in the cellar if they want to "swell up?"

MANAGER.

GOOD SCENARIOS UNAPPRECIATED.

Philadelphia, Pa., June 2, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World,

Dear Sir: Just a few words—I have read your magazine for some time, but I don't think I ever read a communication from a secenario writer. Probably a few words from one of the clan would not be amiss. Here goes:

In nearly every issue of the Moving Picture World, we read a protest from some point of the compass on the poor quality of the pictures produced. Sometimes this protest is from Manila, P. I., or maybe it's from London, Eng.; in any event, it is a protest.

With all the protests, has the quality of the picture changed? Answer—NO. I think I can give a fairly good reason that it has not. In the first place, the Editors (God bless 'em) don't seem to have any originality; they seem afraid to do anything that has not already been done. The result is poor picture plays. The editors seem to have a grave fear of what "Mrs. Grundy" (personified by other editors) will say. They stick in the same hackneyed ruts as in the creeping days of the picture play.

That is one reason. Here is another—the producing companies will not pay for good stuff; think of a first-class film company offering a man $10.00 for a 28-scene scenario, full of action and with a well-defined plot that is brought out without the use of a stuffed club or a sub-title. Can you beat it? No wonder the quality is poor, if you pay $10.00 for a thing you must expect $10.00 quality in the future.

I have written numerous scenarios, with all kinds of success; have had lots returned, which in turn were accepted by other companies. I have never received over $50 for a script since I have been in the business. Mostly I get insults of the $10 and $15 variety.

Now if a play is worth producing it is worth more than the above small amounts. Occasionally we see a film shown which gives the name of the writer, usually one who has made a name in the short-story line. Do these men get the magnificent sum of $10 for their efforts? I guess not; yet lots of men and women are daily sending in scenarios, and good ones at that, who are getting their little $10 and $15 per.

The film companies can not control the price scale of the operators, yet they can make prices to suit themselves, for those who make the operator's job a possibility. We must admit that a scenario is necessary to produce a play; we must further admit that all scenarios can not be "doped" out in the editorial department. Therefore, scenario writers are a necessary evil, why not pay for talent? Some of the picture plays look as though they were written in a boiler factory to the accompaniment of an "anvil chorus," and show about as much thought as would be possible under the B. F. conditions. This sounds no doubt like the wailings of a sore head; well, maybe it is. But I think any and possibly all scenario writers who read this will agree with me in all that I have written.

I want to touch on one more thing before I close; why is it necessary for the great majority of film companies to keep a manuscript two and three weeks before any word is received concerning it? All that I have had business with do this with the exception of one company. It is a pleasure to do business with that one company because you know within four days just where you stand. The others, well—some time I have to think whether I really wrote the stuff they write about or not. Gee whiz! but it sure is encouraging.

Well, Mr. Editor, I suppose by this time you are about distracted by this epistle, but I feel better now that I have, in a measure, let off steam. I will ask you "as a poor, but deserving" scenario writer, not to disclose my name, because if you do, the next time I submit a scenario, I will not receive the usual $10, but merely a wreath.

Thanking you for your compassion in reading this (I feel sure you did) and wishing you continued success and prosperity, I am,

Yours very truly,

"INTER NOS."

ANOTHER WAIL FROM AN UNDERPAID SCENARIO WRITER.

When, some time ago, I met a "bally cockney" who insisted on telling me how much better everything was in "dear old Lunnon," I casually inquired why in thunder he hadn't stayed there?

I feel like asking much the same question of your correspondent who, in the issue of July 15, sings his plaintive wail, on the futility of being funny.

If, as he jocosely remarks, the Sunday sections and the magazines will pay so much better prices for "stuff," why in the name of common horse sense don't he turn his humorous cerebrum on the dastard manufacturers, and let his wit scintilate in the comic sections, at from two to four cents a word?

I make no quarrel with his statement that the prices paid for successful scenarios are ludicrously inadequate. If that did not come so near being a tragedy to so many writers, it would be the greatest farce ever written.

That a writer should draw from the storehouse of experience or invention an idea, evolve from that idea a plot, arrange that plot into a logical sequence of scenes, with detail of business, etc. Should then use the necessary paper, typewriter wear and tear, and postage, all that he may possibly (for mark you, it is not even a probability) get a munificent check for eight dollars—all this is, except to the poor devil who happens to be playing the unfortunate role of author, a huge joke.

For that that eight dollar story is no figment of your correspondent's heated imagination, I can testify. I once received a like check, from probably the same "reputable firm," for I cannot imagine there being two firms equally extravagant in their payments for Mss.

But all the jeremiades this side of chaos will not effect a rise in the financial temperature of the average manufacturer's scenario department.

There is only one way. Send back those five and eight dollar checks. Insist on a fair price for a salable scenario, and if you don't get it, turn to the comic sections and the magazines.

Even the most talented of directors, talented at least in the revamping of old film stories and the filching of magazine story plots, will come to the end of his rope sooner or later, if the rank and file of the scenario writers would refuse the pittance offered.

For that Court of Last Resort—the Public, is even now demanding a better class of films. They are daily becoming better educated to the possibilities of the photoplay; and their incessant demands must be met, not alone by good acting, fine scenery and clear photography, but by clean, crisp, intelligent, up-to-date stories.

Verily the man behind the nickel or dime is the final arbiter, and through him and his demands. I am optimistic enough to believe the scenario writer will eventually come into his own. Oh, thou Pro Bono Publico, hasten the day.

Another help to this "consummation devoutly to be wished."

Why does not the writer get credit for his work, on the screen? Why does not the author's name appear as it should, under the title? I have heard various specious arguments, but the only tenable one—one, by the way, that I have never heard mentioned—is because the public would thus come to know the writers of the kind they like, and they would demand more of his work. This would force the manufacturers to go to those men, and naturally, pay them better prices.

It would mean a real reputation for the writer; not one that is hid in the editor's desk, but one that every attendant of a show would come to know and demand.

By all means, my dear Mr. K., go to the magazines with your stuff when the manufacturer refuses an honest wage, and take as many of your fellows with you as you can. Thus and thus only will "Caeser get his due."

GORDON V. MAY.

MAKERS "WESTERN MAD."

Cleveland, O.

Editor Moving Picture World,

Dear Sir: I am enclosing a clipping of an editorial from the "Cleveland Press" of April 19th, which, if brought to the attention of film manufacturers, might be the means of the better moving pictures the article calls for.

I have never seen the situation discussed so briefly and so truly as in this short article.

Another deplorable defect in certain Independent manufacturers' films is their inability or desire, apparently, to turn out films in focus.

We have run films of some of these companies at our house so miserably out of focus as to spoil completely a film otherwise a good subject and well acted.

Some of these show the fault to be the cameraman's, and others show it to be due to printing the positive out of contact.

Why in the name of common sense are so many film producers Western mad?

The screens of some of our theaters are so overrun with cowboys and revolvers that the average intelligent person is disgusted.

Most respectfully,

462 E. 123rd Street. BILLIE WALTERS.

BETTER MOVING PICTURES.

From the Cleveland Press.

It is said that the moving picture show is not so popular as it was. If that be true, it is not the fault of he public, but of the show.

Nothing that recent times have given us is richer in possibilities of refined entertainment and even valuable education than the moving pictures.

Science, travel, history, the masterpieces of literature—all these can be placed before the eyes and planted in the minds of the masses at a trifling cost by this marvelous device.

But the enterprising gentlemen who supply the films appear to think that the public wants little or nothing that is really good or inspiring.

They sit up nights plotting revolting tragedy, exaggerated melodrama and Sunday-supplement comedy to feed our boys and girls.

The moving picture show should be preserved for the good it may do, even if the public has to buy it up and supply it as freely as it does now the common school education. As now conducted, it is long on chaff and short on wheat.

BALANCING THE PROGRAM.

Owasso, Mich., June 29, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World.

Dear Sir:—It is with much pleasure that I read the editorial from the pen of Mr. J. J. Reider, of Jackson, Mich., regarding the balanced program, which is, to the exhibitors of the State of Michigan, a thing of the past. We were permitted, at one time, but in the "dark ages," to select our programs, which then enabled us to maintain a standard program of good subjects.

But what are we subject to now? The exchange man's idea of a program, fitting to the pleasure of our patrons, whom he has never seen, is to simply hand out what he pleases. Take it or not, just as you wish. Is that business? All he looks for is the weekly check.

The time is now ripe for something to be done here in this State, which will enable the exhibitor to have some say as to what he sees fit to place on the screen. If there is a State in the Union that it is in need of a radical change, Michigan is the one. I hope the coming convention of July 11, 12, 13, will find every exhibitor who cares for his business welfare on hand then, with plenty of amunition and not afraid to use it. Wake up, brothers, and let this convention be the turning point in Michigan for its exhibitors.

Respt. yours,

B. L. CONVERSE.

FAKED THE PUBLIC.

Cleveland, O., May 29, 1911.

Dear Sir.—Your recent article on swelling the box office bank account was lost on one manager. A large motion picture house recently changed management. The new manager is desirous of making good and this is one of his ways of doing so. On Sunday 5,000 feet of film was advertised, one of which was the Imp de Luxe "The Forged Dispatch." The rest of the program was good, but I paid my 10 cents to see the Imp. After waiting out two entire shows, I failed to see "The Forged Dispatch." I spoke to the manager and he stated the exchange failed to come across and he didn't get the feature, yet at the same time he was gazing soulfully at the flaring lithograph which had and was still advertising to the public. Now if this is a trick of the trade, it is none of the public's business, but if it is dishonest advertising I think you could do well to run another series such as you recently did. Thanking you for your time, I beg to remain,

CLARENCE WEBER,

CORRESPONDENCE

Los Angeles.

New Theater Opens.—The Aerotorium Theater, of Avalon, Catalina Island, some twenty miles off the Los Angeles County coast, opened on June 28th to s crowded house, who were appreciative of the fine bill of moving pictures and illustrated songs. The new theater will fulfill a long-felt want on the island by giving the crowds something to amuse them at night.

Arthur S. Hyman, the local moving picture theater capitalist, has assimilated three more houses. Last wek he bought out his partner, Chas. Prochszki, and now owns outright the leases of the College, Rounder and Royal theaters. Otber theaters of the Hyman Circuit are the heantiful new Neptune, Venice; the Hyman, Los Angeles, and the Luna Park, Los Angeles. The College, Hyman and Neptune theaters run an equal number of vaudeville and picture acts, but the other three dispense film art only. For a man still ln his early thirties, Mr. Hyman ls doing quite well.

Stanley Ward Hart.—House manager of tbe Broadway Hyman, and press agent for the circuit, has been promoted and hereafter will be the general manager of the circuit, an arrangement permitting Mr. Hyman more time to assimilate more new houses and huild others.

Lyric Theater goes Independent.—The Lyric Theater, 128 S. Spring Street, have changed their service from Licensed to Independent, the change taking place on June 29th. They have signed up for second run Independent service, secured througb the local exchange of Miles Brothers.

Butler's Closes.—Butler's Theater, 608 S. Hill Street, has closed for the summer. The theater has tried both Licensed and Independent service, but not being on a well traveled transient street, could make a success with neither. It is said that the theater will he closed for the summer, reopening early ln the fall. The theater has just recently heen completed and is first class in its appointments.

Family Theater Closes.—The Family Theater, Main Street, near 5th, has closed its doors. The lease expired recently. The proprietor wished to make a new lease, but the owners of the property demanded a rental twice that called for in the expired lease, so the project was ahandoned. The theater has been using second run Independent service, and had heen playing to good business.

Mirror Theater, Santa Ana.—Santa Ana's newest moving picture theater, The Mirror, opened Saturday, July 1st, to excellent business. The new theater ls strictly first-class in appointments, including tile lohby floor, marble wainscoting, leather npholstered opera chairs, the loge seats of which are ROCKERS—certainly a curious innovation, but as these loge seats are reserved for women patrons, the innovation will prohahly be appreciated. The operating room lncludes two new Powers No. 6 Cameragraphs and other apparatus, installed hy the California Film Excbange, througb which the new theater ls taking new run Independent service.

Star Theater Reopens.—Tbe Star Theater, on East 5th Street, has reopened under new management, wlth old run Independent service. The theater has changed hands a dozen times in the past two years, every man trying to run it finding that it was a losing game. Local exhibitors are predicting that the theater will he closed hy the time this paragraph appears in print.

Newport Theater Opens.—The Newport moving picture theater, Newport, Santa Ana county, just completed, opened at the seaside city last week. They are using Independent service, secured through the local California Film Excbange.

San Fernando Theater.—A new moving picture theater opens this week at San Fernando, and will he known as the San Fernando Tbeater. They are nsing late run Independent service, secured through one of the local exchanges. It is the first theater to open in the valley town and should play to good husiness.

Florodora Theater.—East 1st Street, near Main Street, whicb has been dark for some time is to be sold at auction next week. The theater has used both Independent and Licensed service and was using the latter when they closed their doors. Competition, to quote one of the East First Street exhibitors, was: "something fierce." Tbere are five picture shows on East 1st Street in a space of six blocks, three of whicb are run by Japanese.

New Alhambra Theater.—A new moving picture tbeater ls ahout to he opened in Albambra, a Los Angeles suburb. The new house will be under the proprietorship and management of Frazier Shaw, well known in Australia and the Antipodes as a moving picture lecturer. The new theater starts with Independent film service.

New Whittier Theater.—Southern California seems to have gone moving picture mad. From every town and hamlet from Santa Barhara to San Diego comes news that new tbeaters are being erected or have already opened. Many of them are even luxuriously equipped and would be a credit to the business section of big cities. A new theater is to be opened next week at Whittier. The theater will be under the management of the Whittier Amusement Company, and will be known as tbe Whittier Theater. They are using late run Independent service.

"Fall of Troy." This popular Itala film is still in hig demand throughout Southern California among the suburban exhibitors. The film has been booked by four suburban exhihitors for a return engagement.

Star Theater, Anaheim, bave signed up for Independent service witb one of the local exchanges.

RICHARD V. SPENCER.

Cleveland.

Early in the season E. W. Sprosty, proprietor of the Tabor Theater, Broadway, leased a vacant lot near his theater and built an airdome, sesting 700 people. The venture has proved a great and popular success; patrons are pleased and business is booming. Mr. Sprosty hopes to secure a long lease on the location, in which case he will put up a top against rainy nights.

Franklin Matthews, the New York Sun msn, who accompaned the U. S. fleet on its tour around the world, has been a feature at the Hippodrome for the past two weeks. His illustrated talks were interesting and instructive.

Under the auspices of the Cleveland Press Mr. Robertson, a well kuown travelog man, is filling an extended engagement at the Elysium. Business is very satisfactory.

The Scenic and Beck theaters on Lorain Avenue, bave heen closed by the hot weatner. The Cozy bas been closed for repairs, and will open about Aug. 1, with double its present capacity—over 500 seats. Manager Rosenberger proposes to make the Cozy one of the finest theaters on the West Side.

Bronx Theater, on Erie Street, formerly Marlo Hall, has been reopened and is one of the neatest bouses in the city. A baby grand piano played hy young lady pianists of ability, provides the music. The Bronx is one of the three downtown houses that does not use automatic music. Frank L. Smith, formerly of the Glenside, is manager.

The Lorain Theater dropped vaudeville some weeks ago and bas maintained good business at the ten cent rate. Though the Lorain previously offered vaudeville from the first, Manager Tom Cohen has ahout decided not to run it again.

Manager Marcus offered the Globe Theater, at 55th Street and Woodland, for the commencement of the Jewish Orphan Asylum on Monday, July 10. Although it seats 1,200, it was too small to accommodate the crowd that attended.

Mrs. J. E. Willis is visiting Mr. F. C. Aiken, of the Chicago office of the General Film Company, and his wife.

Mr. Paul Qualtrougb, of the Photoplay Adv. and Specialty Co., of Pittshurg, ls in the city on business connected wlth the two Cleveland offices of the company. Mr. Earl Hatch, of the local offices, is spending his vacation at Niagara Falls and other points in the East.

The Pittshurg Amusement Co. has leased the store near the corner of Euclid Ave. and E. 8th St., formerly occupied hy S. S. Kresge & Co.'s 5 and 10 cent store, and will install an up-to-date photoplay theater. Capacity will he ahout 350.

Cole & Heinz, proprietors of the National and other picture and vaudeville houses, are remodelling a large building on W. 25th St., near Clark, into a theater. The new house will open ahout Sept. 1 with a capacity of 1,200 seats.

The Newhurg Realty Co. is huilding a new bouse at 75th St. and Broadway, to seat 700 persons. Mr. V. O. Woodward, wbo will have general charge of it, offers $20.00 in gold for the best name suggestion.

Tbe Bettis Amusement Co. of Toledo, has reopened the Colonial after doubling its capacity and making extensive lmprovements. With 900 fine opera chairs installed upstairs and down, with two Powers No. 6 machines, in the hands of a first-class operator, wlth the house brightly illuminated hy the indirect reflecting system, and with an orchestra rendering an excellent musical accompaniment to the photoplays, Mr. Bettis has a plant to he proud of. But in giving four reels of late Licensed pictures at a nickel admission, he is certainly making a mistake, which even in summer makes it necessary for the operator to race the film through the machine.

"On to Cleveland," should be the slogan of all those in the moving picture husiness, and especially of exhibitors the nation over, during the halance of tbis month. The National Convention, which will convene Aug. 1, 2, 3, in Wehher's Hall, wlll certainly be largely attended hy Ohio exhihitors, and hy hundreds of others. The banquet alone should amply repay a trip from 'Frisco to Cleveland, according to specifications.

Motion pictures were made of the "Sane Fourth" parade on Independence Day. So well pleased are the City Fathers at the success of this year's celebration, that a National Convention of Sane Fourth boomers from all cities which have adopted the idea will he held here in October.

O. L. Brailey, proprietor of the Princess and Royal theaters, Toledo, is huilding a new picture and vaudeville house on St. Clair St., to seat over a thousand persons. The new theater will be called the Columbia, and will open early in the fall.

Some of the downtown picture houses carry small cards in the Toledo newspapers, announcing their attractions for the day. This idea may well be copied hy exhihitors in other cities where the advertising rates for amusements are not prohibitive.

B. G. DRUMMOND.

Seattle

Mr. Eugene Levy, manager of the Grand Opera House, and others, has entered into negotiations with the Selig Polyscope Co., of Chicago, with a view to taking moving pictures of the "Golden Potlatch," a celebration to be held in Seattle next mouth. Recently his theaters showed a film of the Pasadena rose carnival, and last week the moving picture men were in Portland, so that the Portland Rose Carnival pictures will soon be on view. "No better advertisement is in the reach of Seattle than that offered in the form of a moving picture reproduction of the 'Golden Potlatch,'" said Mr. Levy. The manufactrers are keen to take advsntage of opportunities of this kind, so Mr. Levy has written the Chicsgo house setting forth the objects and scope of the "Potlatch."

The Pacific Film Exchange of this city, has opened a branch office in Butte, Montana, 29 West Psrk St. Mr. Chss. Malloy is acting ss msnsger.

Mr. W. T. Parker has bought the City Theater of this city. The policy of the house will remain the same.

The motion picture operators are a happy bunch, and the city electrician feels very dissatisfied. The Public Safety Committee, of the city council, recommended an ordinance providing that moving picture machines may be run either by hand or by moter. Joslyn wanted to get a bill through prohibiting the use of motors unless the city electrician be given the power to make rules and regulations governing operators and charge a monthly fee of $2 for every machine, enabling him to place another inspection in the field. The motion picture operators declare that Joslyn wanted to have complete control over them, and he was also criticized by members of the council for drawing up an ordinance giving himself power over the moving picture business in the city.

When the Alhambra Tbester opened a week ago, it was an experiment, many believing the location was not suitshle for a moving picture bonse; hut the performances given since last Sunday bave attracted all classes of persons, some coming ln sntomohiles, others on street csrs whirling the crowds that found their way there. They have also fonnd, says Manager "Dad" Russell, the largest pictures they have ever seen. The policy of the house is four Independent pictures from the Western Film Co., singer and the Ladies' Orchestra, playing to the pictures. The admission is 5 cents.

Upon Mr. Ray Grombacher's return from his branch office of the Pacific Film Exchange, Vancouver, B. C., Canada, he reports that Mr. J. R. Muir, of Vancouver, B. C., formerly manager of the Dominion Amusement Co., is expecting to open his new house which will, when completed, cost about $60,000.

The new house will seat 900 people, all the seats heing upholstered. The lobby alone will cost $16,000. It will also have a $10,000 pipe organ. The house when finished will be one of the prettiest bouses on the coast.

Manager Powell announces that the Coliseum Theater will have a free Children's day on June 29 and 30, Thursday and Friday. The children will have an opportunity of seeing eight first-run films, because the progrsm is again changed Friday. A feature of the program is the Champion release, "The Boy Scouts to the Rescne," wbich ought to prove of great interest to the youngsters, as there are five companies of the young scouts in Seattle at present. Added to this will be the regulsr show and musical program hy the Coliseum singers, accompanied hy the Coliseum orchestra of six pieces.

Samuel Hill entertained a group of newspsper men and a number of special guests at his residence June 27, 1911, giving a moving picture and stereopticon lecture on good roads and highway huilding in this state. An excellent luncheon was served. Besides the newspaper, Jndges R. B. Albertson and J. T. Ronald, Virgil Bogue, C. C. Rumsey, C. P. Chamberlain and Baron Wolf Von Lohneyson were guests of Mr. Hill. Most of the moving pictures shown last night were new, having heen taken last week, and just prepared for exhihition. The reels were run off for the first time for the henefit of the newspaper men's gathering. They showed road work in process of completion and the convicts at work and in camp. These films are to he loaned hy Mr. Hill to moving picture houses throughout the State for educational purposes. A number of views, showing the progress of road building on Mr. Hill's big tract of land at Maryhill, where he is hnilding ten miles of improved highways at his own expense, were shown. In this road work, Mr. Hill has introduced some new features and has found the experiment in roadhuilding successful.

The Class (A) Theater, of this city, have secured the rights for the exhibition of the Paris-Madrid aeroplane contest, which will, no douht, be a good drawing card. Next week the featnre of tbe bill will he, "Nero and the Burning of Rome."

An ordinance regulating the use of motors and the operation of moving picture machines, was passed and will go into effect July 26, 1911. It provides that no one under 21 years of age shall operate a machine. An examination of all operators and the issuance of a license to the successful ones, and allows the use of motors.

A Special exhibition of moving pictures of Seattle, the Northwest and Canada, was given at the Alhambra Theater, June 28, 1911, before an audience gathered for the occasion. The films belonged to W. H. Harbeck, formerly official motion picture photographer of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The first picture, showing lumbering in Washington, from the logging camp to the saw mill, from the log to the finished lumber, ready for shipment, was shown on the screen with good results. The machinery in the mill, the big saw cutting the log into slabs, the machinery carrying it to the planers, sorting and sending to the freight cars, all was shown in every detail. The second and third films took the audience into the beauty spost of Canada. A large number of the pictures shown were those used by the Canadian Pacific Railway in exploiting Canada, taken by Mr. Harbeck. They were explained to the audience, and the purpose of presenting them was to urge them to use the same method in exploiting in the East, Seattle and the great Northwest.

A new theater is being erected at 1st and Cherry Street, and will be called "The Pastime." The house wil cost $60,000, and will be equipped with everything up to date. Further particulars will be given in a later number of the World.

The Coliseum Theater has secured the motion pictures of the "Child Welfare Exhibit," and will be shown here July 17 to 22, from 10 A. M. to 1.30 P. M. This exhibit, costing over $100,000, drawing together over a half million of people in New York and Chicago, showing everything pertaining to child-life in the modern city. The motion pictures of the "Child Welfare Exhibit" will occupy the most of the time, showing the openings of the exhibit from clubs, scouts, settlements, homes, laws, recreation, libraries, museums, etc. The whole program will occupy over three hours, but the order will be varied each day, so that one may see all the exhibit in three one-hour visits. These pictures have been endorsed by the leading citizens of Seattle, and Dr. J. E. Crichton, Commissioner of Health, says: "It is an exhibit that every one in Seattle ought to see." An added feature will be the musical program. This exhibit is given under the auspices of the Mothers' Congress, Mrs. C. E. Bogardus, president; Anna Louise Strong, lecturer. Much credit is due Manager S. A. Powell for securing these films.

The Alhambra Theater will have special features in addition to the regular performance on Saturdays, Sundays and holidays, and the price of admission will be 5 and 10 cents on these days. The Western Film Co. are furnishing service to the Alhambra. The policy of the house is four reels three times weekly.

Mr. H. E. Cawthorn, president of Local 154 I. A. T. S. E., has been to Niagara Falls, N. Y., attending the International Convention of the I. A. T. S. E., July 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, as delegate for the operators of Local 154.

The Washington Theater has secured the motion pictures of the "First Official Suffragist Parade," held in New York City from H. C. Rawlings, and will be shown July 5, 6, 7, 1911. Mr. Rawlings will leave shortly to tour Washington, Oregon and California, with his special reels.

L. L. GOLDSMITH.

Louisville

Louisville moving picture show managers are distinctly gratified over what they term to be a re-awakening in business during the past week. The rejuvenation was felt perceptibly in all local houses, but especially in the suburban establishments. It was in some degree expected, as there is always noticeable stimulation in picture circles about this time of the year.

The improvement in local picture ranks is attributable to a seasounble change in popular taste, recurrent every summer. The pleasure parks open in early summer and for some weeks the merry-go-'rounds, "nigger baby racks," et cetera, attract all the surplus finances of the public, but along about this time of year it is the experience of the picture men that they begin to draw banner mid-summer audiences, a goodly percentage of the increased patronage being culled from the ranks of park habitues who are tired of the roller coaster or the chutes for the time being and who wish to take in a good show or two. In this way the theater managers begin to handle a lot of "back-water" business from the flood tide which rules at amusement resorts during the early summer, and affairs generally assume a better tone. The switch in conditions that became noticeable last week is permanent for the summer and will probably result in steadily improved business being done, especially by the suburban houses, until the end of the hot weather.

One of the prominent picture theater managers of Louisville was talking to a representative of The Moving Picture World the other day regarding the advisability of making the greatest possible effort to obtain notable films before any other exhibitor in the field. "We have been getting in on the ground floor with special films for as long as I can remember, for there is more than one advantage in it," said the showman. "Aside from the fact that it stamps your house as being up-to-date in the highest degree and ready to serve the public the most attractive offerings, there is a lot of future advertising to be gained from the acquisition of an interesting reel before the man around the corner has it. The Jeffries-Johnson fight pictures, for instance, to hark back to a dark period, meant a lot to any exhibitor who could grab them hot off the manufacturer's hands. If you showed them at your house, before anybody else, and then your competitor offered them a week or so later, your competitor came in for some unfavorable comment and you got a lot of highly desirable advertising. The people who saw the show that you gave will pass the competing house and say, 'Why, we saw those films over at So-and-So's week before last,' and forthwith they will always bear you in mind as the exponent of the newest and latest in the show world."

The Crystal Theater, on Market Street near Third Avenue, showed views of King George's recent coronation in England, being the first local showhouse to handle the regal reels. The views were made by an Independent maker and attracted a tremendous amount of business to the Market Street house.

M. Switow, of the Crystal Amusement Co., and one of the foremost picture magnates in the Falls Cities, recently headed a corporation which was formed under the name of the Falls Cities Amusement Co., to handle the handsome $30,000 picture theater which is now being erected at 410 South Fourth Avenue. The Falls Cities' concern is capitalized at $20,000. It has been announced that the house to be managed by tthe new company will be called The Novelty and will make a specialty of garnering the latest and best in the show world to be introduced or produced there. Mr. Switow has been associated with the profession for only three years, but now owns The Crystal and The Novelty (in course of construction), in Louisville, the Dream and Airdome establishments in Jeffersonville, Ind., and the Grand, Crystal and Victoria houses in New Albany, Ind., all of which are now operating very successfully.

Manager Charles A. Shaw, having completed the installation of a lot of new air-cooling and pumping equipment at the Avenue Theater, on Fourth Avenue near Walnut Street, is preparing to run a big Coronation bill this week. The films give the details of the ceremony complete and promise to make good with a vengeance.

With Owner L. J. Dittmar out of town on a short business trip, it was reported that business was running as excellently as could be desired at the Majestic, near the Custom House.

L. J. Dittmar, of the Royal Amusement Co., has been named as an incorporator of the Kinemacolor Co., with a capitalization of $1,000 and a maximum limit of indebtedness of $10,000. The company has been incorporated to exhibit the big run of specially prepared Kinemacolor views of the recent Coronation ceremonies in England, Mr. Dittmar having signed up for three States, Ohio, Indiana and Kentucky, in which he has the exclusive right to show the Kinemacolor offerings. William Todd, of the Majestic Theater, said that in all probability the Mary Anderson Theater would be secured for the special shows in Louisville, but definite arrangements in this regard have not yet been completed. The other incorporators of the Kinemacolor Co. are A. P. Barnard and J. S. Leslie.

"The Broadway, on Broadway near the intersection of the railroad crossing, has been running to capacity houses since the suburban trade has gotten weary of park amusements," said Louis Steurle. The company, of which Mr. Steurle is a member, controlling several shows in Louisville, is running "Ita," the girl mentalist, on the third of her eight weeks' engagement in a mind-reading act at the Ideal Airdome, one of the Broadway company's possessions. The Ideal, at Twenty-third and Market Streets, is doing such fine business that Mr. Steurle is having plans drawn for a permanent winter and summer theater to occupy the site. The theater, which is now in embryo, is to be of the latest and most approved type and will have the unusual seating capacity of 1,200 persons.

The West Broadway Theater, at Eighteenth Street and Broadway, showed an Independent film entitled "Ten Nights in a Barroom," last week, making a distinct hit. Some extensions and improvements, the nature of which cannot yet be outlined definitely, are to be made at the West Broadway in the near future.

The Chattanooga Chamber of Commerce received its moving picture films of Chattanooga, Tenn., last week. The Chattanooga body decided some time ago to inaugurate a motion picture campaign to secure publicity for the Tennessee city, along the line of a national advertisement project, and accordingly some views of Chattanooga, its industries, environs and historic spots surrounding were made by a Chicago firm of film manufacturers. The films were submitted to the Chamber of Commerce for ratification last week and will be sent entour through the country immediately. Their exhibition will be exceptionally low-priced, as the proposition is an advertising one for Chattanooga and practically no profit is expected to be realized.

The Gay Theater, at 402-404 Gay Street in Knoxville, Tenn., opened for business last week, constituting a very handsome and important addition to the moving picture interests of the Tennessee city. The Gay is a fine example of modern theater construction, from its marble-finished lobby, adorned with handsome paintings, through the chair-filled auditorium, which is provided with a sprinkler system in addition to numerous fire-escapes, and back to the roomy stage, asbestos-lined operating room and fine equipment for either hot or cold air. The seating capacity of the new house is 600 persons, with the individual chairs arranged so that a full view of the screen is afforded from each. Two big exhaust fans supplemented by a dozen or more 18-inch electric fans keep a continuous current of air moving through the auidtorium. Forty-five minute shows are being given, consisting of several reels and an illustrated song, from ten in the morning until the same hour at night. The new Knoxville establishment started off with a rush and has been keeping up this straining gait ever since. Ample space, occupied by interesting reading notices delineating some feature of programme or theater, have kept the popular appetite for Gay pictures thoroughly whetted and prove to be highly valuable means of exploitation for the picture show proprietor.

Australian Letter

Sydney, N. S. W., June 5, 1911.

The picture business throughout Australia continues to be the chief factor in the peoples' amusement, judging by results. The cold snap has affected the open air shows, for the people are not keen for sitting under the canopy with the temperature at 56 degrees and 40 degrees.

Since my last letter, the local staff of Spencer's has turned out some excellent work, notably, "The Hero of the Road, Captain Starlight," which was a brilliant success and record-breaker, and highly eulogized by the press and public. Following this is a really superb series of the well known musical play, "The Fatal Wedding," which introduced the famous tin-can band. This scene was portrayed by over 100 children. It ran a week to record business at the Lyceum.

On Tuesday, April 20, their Excellencies, the Governor General and the Countess of Dudley, with Adeline, Countess of Bedford, and a large party were present, a special command night being given by them. The audience was a brilliant one.

I spent an evening at West's new house, the Princess, formerly Bijou. There was a good bill of fare. Sir Beerbohm Tree's "Henry VIII," being the star attraction. West's new house, on the outskirts of the city, is progresing very slowly.

There are several picture manufactnrers here and in Melbonrne now. We scan all their output.

I have it on good authority that Spencer is opening a house in Perth, Western Australia, early in July, he having taken the Theater Royal on a long lease. This popular house has undergone considerable alteration and improvement and, being entirely reseated with up to date chairs, will now accommodate 2,000 persons.

Mr. Heranlt has taken the resident mansgership of Pathe's here.

J. L. G.

St. Louis.

The city authorities have started a crusade on all moving picture theaters conducting vaudeville. The ordinance reads that not only must the theater owner take out a moving picture license, but also a vaudeville liceuse. This rule greatly affects the smaller photoplay houses that are trying to give their patrons the best that they possibly can for the admission paid. It has not been so long ago since the council enforced a law whereby all theater owners were forced to pay a theater license because they erected a stage on which they conducted amateur acts on amateur nights only. On several occasions I have noticed where the theater manager set a plain grocery box in front of the screen for the singer to stand on it, only to be notified by the city to either remove the box or to take out a regular theater license; this act has greatly hindered the smaller playhouses from giving the public a better show for the money. But the city not being satisfied with this advantage, they proceed to make the unfortunate theater proprieter pay an extra fee for conducting vaudeville acts. While Joseph Wagner, manager of the St. Louis Airdome, located at Prairie and St. Louis Avenues, was conducting an amusing act upon his boards he wss placed under arrest for not hhaving taken out a vaudeville theater license. Another theater that fell victim to this rule was the Pathe Tent show located on Gravois Avenue just west of Jefferson, the manager was notified so late of this rnle that he was unable to open his house for that night.

The locnl moving picture and projection machine operators' unions have started a crusade on all show houses displaying unfair tactics to union labor. The union officials have boycotted the Pathe Tent show at Jefferson and Gravois and the Lillian Theater, located at Lillian and Arlington Avennes. Both managers have, however, decided to favor union labor.

OTTO SCHAEFER.

Pittsburg

The Star Theater, Charlerol, Pa., has just been purchased by Messrs. Cowah & Shebble, who control three other photoplay theaters in this vicinity. The circuit consists of the Star Theater, Donora, Pa.; The Bijou Theater, Monessen, Pa.; The Ideal Theatre, Monongahela, Pa., and the Charlerol House. The Star at Charlerol is using Independent films from the Pittsburg Photoplay, 413 Ferry Street. Films are used one day at the Charlerol house and are then shipped on to the Douora house. Mr. Tom B. Cowann, the general manager, states that considering the hot weather, business has been splendid at these two houses and that quite a number of days in the week he has been compelled to use that seldom-seen sign—S. R. O., although the seating capacity is not to be scoffed at. The Bijou and the Ideal are running Licensed films and are also doing very well. The Bijou will be closed about the middle of this month for alterations.

The Empire, the largest theater in the E. E., located on Collins Avenue, will be closed for three weeks, during which extensive alterations are anticipated. This theater has been open to very good business since its opening by Mr. McTighe. Three acts of popular vaudeville and two reels of Independent pictures from the Pittsburg Photoplay Co. were used. Pictures were changed every day and vaudeville twice a week, charging ten and fifteen cents admission.

The National Theater, at Homewood, Pa., Mr. A. L. Woodside, Mgr., will be closed for ten days to undergo an entire remodeling, and an extension of the seating capacity. Independent pictures from the Independent Film Exchange are being used to almost capacity business. Mr. Wade A. Marlow is still the man behind the battery. Wade believes in running good pictures, so he wades in and does his level best with gratifying results.

Nestor's Mutt and Jeff pictures have taken wonderfully in these diggins, with the result that they are being strongly featured wherever exhibited. We've got to hand it to Nestor, for the Mutt and Jeff film well deserves all its popularity; it certainly is the finest comedy film on the market.

The Lyric Theater, 6004 Penn Avenue, has been closed for the last four weeks. The seating capacity is far too small to competite successfully with the larger houses on the avenne.

The Bijou Dream, at 6017 Penn Avenue, is the oldest house in East Liberty, being one of the first houses built by Mr. Harry Davis. No expenses were spared at its building and it is a veritable dream. The seating capacity is 275, but it has standing room for a hundred more. It is well ventilated and lighted, and last but not least, is very comfortable. Being the only theater in this city using a Mirror screen, the projection is exceptionally good. The projecting battery consists of two No. 6 Power's machines and is well housed in one of the best ventilated booths in the vicinity. The program consists of three Licensed reels from the General Film Co., 436 Fourth Avenue, and an illustrated song by Mrs. Garret Lehman's locally noted soprano. Mrs. Flora Herrick is the proprietress. Mr. B. G. Ross, the manager, is, by the way, one of the first men to run a moving picture machine in that village. An additional musical feature is a $1,500 piano orchestra.

The Liberty, located at 6113-6115 Penn Avenue, has switched from popular vaudeville to straight pictnres for the summer months. The seating capacity is 800 and it has a standing capacity enough to supply a good sized picture house. Having an arsenal of ventilating devices at its disposal, it may well be classed as one of the best ventilated houses in the city. The ventilators consist of two exhaust fans, six ceiling fans and about sixteen more revolving fans. At present five cents admissions is being charged, but when vaudeville is used the admission is to be ten and fifteen cents. Mr. A. Cohn is the manager.

Commencing Monday, the tenth, the Knrsaal Airdome, located at Frankstown and Penn Avenues, contemplates having a canopy built as protection against rain and so that it can be opened earlier in the day. Vaudeville and pictures will be run the first three days and refined musical comedy the last three. At present straight run Independent pictures from the Indian Film Exchange, 413 Ferry Street, are used, charging five cents admission, with gratifying results. Mendel Bros. are the proprietors, A. W. Mendel is the manager.

The manager of the Casino Theater claims to be the only man in America and in fact in the world using a perfect daylight motion picture curtain. Perhaps this is a boast. This manager put on every single one of his lights and there was not a bit of difference in the projection. It certainly is the most wonderful motion picture curtain. Just imagine running your pictures in an auditorium lighted up like day without a mar or blemish on the picture. The Casino is a neat little house of 220 seats, located at 6014 Penn Avenue, and has been doing very well since its opening. The projection is done by two Motographs. Mr. Thomas McWaters is the proprietor. Mr. G. H. Hunt is the manager and is not a novice in the business, having run a model of one of the first motion picture machines at the Opera House, Orange, N. J., about eight or nine years ago. On his own book he has operated a number of houses very successfully.

Minerva was a beautiful Goddess, very, very wise. She knew everything what was going on in the world, and she was loved by every man, woman and child. Now, they've taken her name and pinned it on the nicest little theater in westeru Pennsylvania, very fittingly, indeed. Minerva is the name chosen by the new theater at 319-321 Fifth Avenue. The prize winner is Louis Price, of Epiphany Street, this city, and he deserves that $20 yellow back for such a brilliant suggestion.

EDDIE WHEELER.

In the Mississippi Valley

The board of directors of the Wildey Theater, at Edwardsville, Ill., will give motion pictures a trial, and if successful, they will rule the year around, except when road shows are booked. Programs will be censored and an effort made to have the performances as educational as possible. R. J. Macklin is manager and W. B. Thomas, musician. Admission will be five cents for children, ten cents for adults and twenty-five cents for box seats.

The new airdome, Tenth and Vermont Streets, Quincy, Ill., opened with pictures and two vaudeville acts.

Hal Gruber is now electrician at the Gem Theater, Taylorville, Ill., succeeding Peter Busby, who resigned.

Charles Vance is giving pictures and vaudeville in the Plumb Opera House at Streator, Ill., for the summer season.

"Summer moving pictures and vaudeville" have failed at the Elks Theater, Taylorville, Ill. John Sansone, lessee under the name of the Sansone Amusement Company, was arrested at Springfield, Ill., and liquidated nearly $300 for creditors before he was allowed to leave again.

The Majestic Airdome, Harrisburg, Ill., featuring pictures has been playing a five-piece orchestra.

Press reports blame moving picture films for the unsuccessful engagement of the Dan S. Fishell Company of St. Louis, at Chester Park, Cincinnati.

Chester Kelley, of Irving, Ill., has purchased an airdome moving picture show in White Hall, Ill.

E. F. Palmer, of Paris, Ill., has sold the New Paris Theater to Frank H. Cassil, of Alma, Neb., who has assumed charge. Mr. Cassil will operate the machine and Mrs. Cassil will be the musician. Plans for remodeling the front are made.

The Tri-City Theater Company, of Rock Island, Ill., has been incorporated with capital stock of $15,000, to do a general theatrical business. The incorporators are Edward T. Dolly, Katherine Dolly, Roy W. Wilmerton and Clarence C. Wilmerton.

A. L. Parsons, of Bloomington, Ill., has purchased the X-Ray Theater at Lincoln, Ill., from Osterman & Meyers. Parsons has an interest in several picture shows in Bloomington.

E. Fellis, proprietor of the Opera House Theater, at Hillsboro, has leased a site and will build a permanent home for his moving picture and vaudeville show. He expects to erect a building which will seat 500 or more people.

Dick Lawrence, of the Hotel Lud, at Peoria, Ill., against whom bankruptcy proceedings were started, blames his investments in three picture shows for a part of his downfall. Among other things which he financed, were an auto livery company and a shoot-the-chutes. With the hotel, all must have received considerable attention.

F. H. M.

Jacksonville, Fla.

The Bijou Theater, after being dark for some months, has been leased by Frank W. Chase and William Dacey. The name will be retained and motion pictures and vaudeville will be the offering. A number of improvements are being made and the house will be re-decorated throughout. It is expected to be open for business on July 1st. The house has a seating capacity of fourteen hundred.

Continuing his progressive spirit, Manager Montgomery, of the Grand Theater, engaged the services of Mr. Chas. Seay, of the Edison Stock Co., to lecture at this house for two weeks on the additional educational films made by the Edison Co. now being shown at this house. It is needless to say the patrons were greatly interested and he held their attention at all times, especially when pictures were exhibited in which he has assumed a part. Mr. Seay has another two weeks' engagement at Manager Montgomery's Grand Theater in Columbia, S. C. This was a special engagement and Mr. Seay rejoins the stock company when his Columbia time is completed, he having made only the four weeks' trip. The Grand Theater of Atlanta, Ga., under the same management, is expected to open on July 1st.

Back to the Primitive (Selig, May 11) which caused so much comment in many of the journals, was made by one of the Selig companies located here. All the African forests and jungles seen in the play are Florida woods. The wrecked steamship and the raft scenes were made at the jetties at the mouth of the St. Johns River. The company has its quarters in Dixieland Park and the scenery in the immediate vicinity is applicable to plays of the tropics. They also have a menagerie of no small proportion which is necessary to the excellent work done by them and the place is well worth a visit.

Notwithstanding the warm weather the attendance at the houses showing late releases keeps up well.

E. O. TEDEMANN

Harrisburg, Pa.

At last it looks as if the operators of this city mean business in getting organized. Applications have already been made for the necessary papers and everything is moving towards a union which, it is hoped, will aid the operators in securing better salaries. At present operators working from 7 P. M. to 11 P. M. are getting from $4.00 to $6.00 per week, and from 10 A. M. until 11 P. M. they are receiving $9.00 to $12.00 per week, which is entirely too low a wage when the work is taken into consideration.

Ben Buckwalters, owner of the Theatorium Theater, made a big hit with Pathe's two reels of Faust. Special music accompanied the pictures, and the patrons were all highly pleased with the show.

Messrs. Adams & Fry, owners of the Star Theater, contemplate remodeling the front and lobby of that house during the first week in August, after which they will adopt a few new ideas along the photoplay line.

Mr. Peter Settino, of Steelton, Pa., has a large force of men at work on his new Orpheum Theater, located at 23 So. Front Street. The frontage is 24 feet with a depth of 100 main; auditorium seating 250, with a gallery seating 200. The third floor will be used as a dance hall. This house is built especially for moving pictures and vaudeville and will be opened on or about Aug. 1, 1911.

The Photoplay is again open after being dark for one week on account of building gallery.

Lenueys new picture house, 9 South 13th Street, running Licensed pictures is reported as contemplating going Independent in the near future.

The Summit, owned by Miss Zarker, and managed by W. N. Miller, continues to do its share of the business of the hill. Independent service is run here.

Mr. Felix Davis manager of Paxtang Park, is trying out one reel of pictures in connection with the regular vandeville program and judging the applauding the pictures receive, it will be made a permanent part of the programme.

Mr. John Marens, owner of two moving picture theaters located on North 3d Street, is running his largest house Licensed and the smaller one Independent to good business regardless of the hot weather.

The Royal Theater, located on Walnut Street, is running Independent service to only fair patronage.

New England

Messrs. Ware Brothers, proprietors of the prosperous Dreamland Theater, Beverly, Mass., closed their theater on Thursday, July 6, owing to the terrific heat. The house was again open for business July 7. Business is holding up in excellent fashion for the Ware Brothers, who deserve the trade because of the continual efforts to give their patrons the best Licensed pictures and songs in the market.

Mr. J. J. Flynn, well known throughout the New England States as a theatrical manager, has opened his Floating Bridge Park, Lynn, Mass., where moving pictures form a part of the entertainment. Business is opening up in good shape, according to Mr. Flynn's local representative.

Manager Nate Brown, of the Broadway Theater, Everett, Mass., has closed his house over the summer, but will reopen in August with W. E. Greene's Independent service, vaudeville from the Merrill Amusement Co. and illustrated songs. "The Broadway's business was quite satisfactory this year," was the statement of Mr. Brown, the popular manager of this theater.

Mr. Manuel Lorenzen, manager of the Nickel Theater, Manchester, N. H., is experiencing no bad effects from the hot weather, and is playing to good business.

Mr. Mike R. Sheedy, of Sheedy's Theater, Newport, R. I., has secured the services of Col. W. F. Mason as assistant manager for that house. Col. Mason is well known in the theatrical line as one well acquainted with his trade, and should prove a valuable acquisition to Sheedy's theater. Mr. Sheedy himself reports his several houses playing to "pop." vandeville and pictures, all to be doing a pleasing business.

Manager Sylvia, of the Idle Hour Theater, New Bedford, Mass., closed his house Saturday, July 8, for a short time. The Idle Hour has been playing to good trade this winter, with "pop" vandeville and pictures, and will reopen under the same policy next month.

"Grenadier Roland" as the feature picture, aided by vandeville and several other reels, gave Manager C. W. Sheafe, of the Majestic Theater, Keene, N. H., a prosperous business during the week of July 3.

The New Portland Theater, Portland, Maine, is using a considerable number of moving pictures in its vandeville bill during the summer, and is doing well. James W. Greeley is managing the New Portand.

Hartford, Conn., is to have an airdome on Main Street, to be built and managed by Messrs. Cushing and Brannack. The Circle Theater, also of Hartford, is under the management of these men, and is considered to be a first class house.

Manager H. F. Jackson, of the Bijou Theater, Fitchburg, Mass., is certainly doing more than his share to bring motography before the favorable attention of the "upper class" of his town. Only last week these columns told of the enterprise of Mr. Jackson when he offered for exhibition moving pictures before a number of school children who were viewing a Shakespeare classic. Mr. Jackson's latest effort in this direction came to hand when he spoke of moving pictures in general before the Fitchburg Merchants' Association. Mr. Jackson is not only a fluent and pleasing speaker, but he also knows "whereof he speaks" on every branch of the trade. Such activity as this is most commendable, and the Moving Picture World is pleased to call its readers' attention to Mr. Jackson's good work.

The Lyric Theater, Beverly, Mass., has decided to discontinue the use of vaudeville with the regular program of pictures during the summer. From July 5 until further notice, moving pictures and songs will be the offering of the Lyric.

Block Island, R. I., has a new moving picture theater, operated by Messrs. Spitz and Nathanson, proprietors of the Empire Theater, Providence, R. I. One thing is certain, the Block Island house should prove itself a winner, as it is the first motion picture house on the island. Messrs. Spitz and Nathanson evidently are not at all nervous about their new house, as these two theatrical managers are now busily engaged catching fish in Maine, whence they will return early in August. The Empire Theater is closed for the summer, and will open Labor Day, after many alterations and improvements have been made.

Chief Operator F. J. Charlton, of the Bijou Theater, Fitchburg, Mass., is in charge of the moving pictures exhibited at the State Normal School of Fitchburg. Operator Charlton and Superintendent Thompson are working together on this experiment. Fitchburg is most friendly to the pictures; schools, churches and other educational bodies are continually availing themselves of motography in that city.

HENRY.

Washington, D. C.

One of the latest cool advertisements before the motion picture houses, is a block of ice in which is incased the name of the chief attraction. This can be seen daily before the Virginia. This theater had an exceptional run of Macbeth for several days.

Harry Tanner, the base singer of New York, is appearing at several of the Moore houses. He is not heard in negro and comic songs, as are usually given in moving picture theaters, but sings artistic renditions of ballads and appropriate selections from the light operas.

The Moore Amusement Company has added two more houses to its circle—the Star and the American. At present some of these showa run independent and some Association films, but when complete consolidation is effected, all houses will use the same class of reels, according to which gives the best satisfaction. Tom Moore has always been a Licensed man and is willing to continue one, but troubles in getting suitable programs has got him guessing.

The Military Field Mass had a successful run of one week at the Casino. Many of the clergy and Catholic laiety witnessed this reproduction of the first religious service of this character to be held in the National Capital. The greatness of the attending crowd is well brought out, while President Taft makes a special feature. The next reel will be superior to the one now being exhibited.

W. H.

Among the Exhibitors

Houston, Tex.—Messrs. Jackson & McKinnon, proprietors of the Unique Picture Show ,have opened another theater here.

Benton Harbor, Mich.—Benton Harbor is to have another moving picture theater erected which will cost about $6,500. It will be located on the corner of Sixth and East Main Street. The owner and manager of this new enterprise is Mr. William Shaw Baxter, who christened it the name of the "Princess." High-class vaudeville and moving pictures will be shown.

Philadelphia, Pa.—Another big moving picture theater is being planned for Frankford. A large lot being purchased by a large theatrical syndicate.

Lynn, Mass.—A new moving picture theater is being planned to be erected in Salem.

Kansas City, Mo.—The Rubert Amusement Company have secured a lease on the building located at 211-13 East Twelfth Street, and will conduct a vaudeville and moving picture theater.

Rockville, Conn.—Thurston M. Wilcox, of Springfield, is contemplating the erection of a new theater here.

WIFIE'S NEW HAT (July 24).—Strange indeed were the events which first threatened to disrupt the happy home of Will Lewis and his wife, and later on saved all their worldly wealth. It started when Grace wanted a certain hat. It was a cheap thing, costing only fifty dollars, but Will did not want her to have it, and refused to give her the money to buy it. Cruel man! The abused woman thereupon wrote to her father, and father sent her the money. Now when Wil saw her wearing the hat, he became extremely jealous, suspecting that some other man had bought it for her. He was

At the same time, a friend informed him that the bank in which he had his account was on the verge of failure. Will rushed to the bank and withdrew his money, getting over fifty thousand dollars in bills and securities. This he took home and placed in the safe. Soon after he had done this, Grace returned. So fearful that something might happen to her new bonnet, she looked around for a place to put it. Ah! the safe. She opened it. Finding many bundles of bills and securities, she took them out and put them in a drawer of the desk, thus making room in the safe for her hat. That night burglars broke in, cracked the safe, and found only the hat. In their rage, they tore it to pieces.

Just as they were leaving, Will heard a noise. Hurrying from his bedroom, he was horrified to find the safe open and all his money and valuables gone. He was almost insane when his wife arrived. Grace fell to weeping over her ruined hat. Will pointed out the fact that fifty thousand dollars, their entire fortune, had been stolen. "Oh, no it hasn't," said Grace. "I put that money in this drawer to make room for my hat." And there, indeed, were all the precious packages of green backs and yellow backs, bonds and stocks untouched.

There certainly was some joy in the Lewis' home, and Will declared that Grace should have enough money to buy twenty hats if she wanted it.

THE NEW OPERATOR (July 24).—Sam Smith was a young man with plenty of nerve, and nothing much besides. He decided that he would make a good moving picture photographer and secured a position.

He started out with his camera, determined to get some wonderful pictures. In a park, he saw a young couple, who were seated on a bench, engaged in the pleasant pastime known as spooning. Sam decided that this would make a mighty good film. Concealing his machine carefully behind some bushes, he started to take the picture, but he was discovered by the young couple, and the gentleman sneaked around, grabbed the new operator and proceeded to give him a trouncing. While this was going on, a small boy sneaked around and turned the handle of the machine, recording just what was happening to Sam.

Not to be discouraged by his first experience, Sam started to take a picture of a policeman, who was peacefully resting near a fence. Just at that moment, some boys dumped a pail of water on the officer of the law. The policeman vented his anger on Sam.

Poor Sam got in several other mix-ups, and finally he sent the machine back to his employer's plant with a note stating that he had decided that he did not want the job.

The films were developed and printed, and in the testing room, they furnished unlimited amusement for the employees, as they showed not only Sam's experience, but pictures which were double exposures upside down and so on.

DURING CHERRY TIME (July 27).—Vera La Croix was an actress, a very beautiful one, with great charm and fascination. She went to spend a part of the summer at a beautiful rustic place, Shady Dell.

Among the guests at the summer hotel were Tommy Smart, his mother, and Tommy's sweetheart, Violet. Now Violet was just as nice a little girl as any man could want, but the minute Tommy saw Vera, her dashing style and the fascination of her city manners and elegant gowns, captivated him. Vera was accustomed to the admiration of men, and as men were scarce in Shady Dell, she was inclined to have a little flirtation with Tommy. Tommy was about to fall head over heels in love with her in spite of the protests of his mother. Finally his mother wrote to her brother, a lawyer, asking his aid in getting Tommy out of the actress' power. The lawyer, John, arrived, and promptly took Vera to task for her actions.

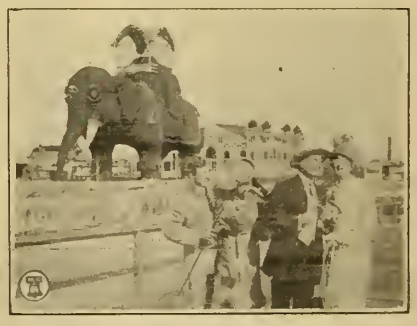
When Vera learned the real facts of the case, she was very anxious to make peace again between Tommy and Violet. Vera, in fact, was a very sweet young girl. She dressed Violet up in one of her elegant gowns, fixed her hair in fascinating ringlets. This was only part of what she did in a scheme of hers to restore Tommy to his first love.

Meanwhile, John had become more and more charmed with the real nature of Vera, and in the end persuaded her to become his own wife.

PATHE.

THE DAUGHTER OF THE WATCH (July 17).—An exciting story of love and intrigue in which the daughter of the old night watchman is carried away by her noble lover to his castle. The aged father follows as best he can, and finally help comes from an unexpected quarter and the girl is rescued. The film gives a perfect picture of life in the fifteenth century.

HER GYPSY RIVAL (July 19).—A gypsy girl runs away from her tribe and finds employment in a wealthy man's home. She has no idea who she is or who were her parents, and all that remains to her of her babyhood is a little gold locket. The sweetheart of the young daughter of her employer falls in love with the gypsy, which brings about her discharge. This leads to the discovery of the locket, and the gypsy proves to be her employer's own daughter, lost many, many years before.



Scene from "A Gay time at Atlantic City" (Lubin).

MEMORIES OF THE PAST (July 20).—A young man and woman are engaged to be married. They announce it at a fancy dress ball on her birthday. A famous painter, however, decides to paint her picture; this leads to another love affair, and the girl finally marries the artist. Years later the rejected suitor's nephew falls in love with the daughter of this couple. The nephew gains his uncle's consent to their marriage through the striking resemblance of the daughter to the portrait of the old sweetheart, who had been the only real love he ever had.

THE PERFUME CLUE (July 21).—A gambler at Monte Carlo returns to his hotel and his wife, ruined and discouraged. At his wife's suggestion, they manage to rob their next door neighbor of a lot of jewels. The woman, unfortunately, however, leaves her handkerchief behind her. The hotel management calling in Nick Winter, the famous detective, on the case, he discovers the handkerchief, which is scented with a peculiar perfume, and with this as a clue he catches the culprits.

HER BOY (July 22).—A sick woman living in a squalid tenement has only her little child to support her. In order to do this, the boy steals some flowers to sell, but is caught, however, and taken to the police station. Here his story so touches the hearts of the police officers and the woman who caused his arrest that she begs for his release and visits with him his poor home. Being wealthy, she quickly decides to care for the unhappy family, and in the last scene we see them well clothed and happy.

KALEM.

BY THE AID OF THE LARIAT (July 21).—A pioneer family traveling over the hills in a prairie schooner, go into camp for the night. An Indian scout, who from an adjacent hill has noted the preparations of the pale face for camping, sees a chance for plunder. Signaling the Indian camp, a raid is planned. In the meantime May rides to the spring for fresh water, but just as she is about to scoop up a pailful of the clear, cool spring water Indians appear. Dropping her pail, she quickly mounts her horse and rides for dear life. Reaching an eminence, she sees across a deep canyon Lariat Jim, a horse herder, to whom she signals for help. Jim signals to May to ride up to a point where the canyon becomes narrow. Arriving at this place Jim throws his lariat across to May, who fastens it to a tree and performs the thrilling feat of crossing hand over hand on the lariat to the other side of the canyon, Jim with his handy gun covering her retreat. The Indians attempting to follow, Jim cuts the lariat and takes May upon his horse and rides to a nearby cattle ranch, where a posse is quickly organized. Riding to the pioneer's camp ,the rescuers arrive in time to save May's family from the Indians, who have made a vicious attack on the little party that is bravely defending the prairie schooner, their portable home.

A CHANCE SHOT (July 24).—Red Fox, an Indian brave, wins White Doe, the chief's daughter, but to emphasize the fickleness of the Indian husband he becomes enamored of Mary, a settler's daughter. Finding that his pleas for her love have no effect on the white girl he captures her and binding her to a tree, leaves her to think over in solitude his request that she become wife No. 2. White Doe, discovering what her husband has done, liberates the white girl and while guiding her through the forest they are overtaken by Red Fox, who recaptures the white girl. Binding thongs around her wrists he throws the ends of the thongs over the limb of a tree, making them fast. Jack Howard, a hunter, shooting at a deer misses the animal and by chance cuts the thongs that hold Mary in her uncomfortable position. She cries out and on the arrival of the hunter who follows the sound of her voice, she falls fainting to the ground. Jack quickly revives her and takes her to her home. Just as they are about to enter her father's cabin, Red Fox, having discovered her escape and having trailed the hunter and Mary, attempts a vicious attack on the white man, but is shot in the wrist by White Doe. Jack is inclined to make short work of the Indian, but Mary interferes. Hurrying into the cabin, she brings forth an Indian peace pipe that has previously been given to her and tells them all they must smoke the pipe of peace. At first Red Fox refuses, but Mary begs him, and they all take a puff from the pipe. Red Fox now repentant makes his peace with White Doe and they disappear into the forest.

CONQUERING CARRIE (July 26).—Carrie announces to her employer that she intends to entertain a few friends. Fixing up a bit, Carrie prepares to receive her company. While the party is at its height the boss arrives. As the festivities are proceeding fast and furious, Carrie bursts up the party. The next morning Carrie has a big head and is generally used up. On the appearance of the iceman she shows her ill temper by throwing him bodily out of the house. The iceman reports to his boss and little Willie, a seven-foot husky, is put on the job to take care of Carrie. On little Willie's appearance Carrie has another tantrum, but is quickly conquered by the iceman. From her pinnacle as queen of everything she surveys she descends to her proper plane as meek as a lamb.

THE INDIAN MAID'S SACRIFICE (July 28).—During an attack on the Matelija Indian village, Wana, a beautiful Indian girl, is captured. Don Pablo, a Mexican gentleman, rescues Wana and places her in the care of the old Padre at San Louis Rey Mission. Two months later Wana again meets her rescuer. Romero, a half breed, is rejected by Ruhia, Don Pablo's sweetheart. Out of revenge Romero urges the Indians to rise and exterminate the mission settlement. Romero plans to kill Don Pablo during the dagger dance at the annual harvest festival. Wana, disguised as a boy, accepts Romero's challenge to the dagger dance and saves Don Pablo's life. After the tragedy Wana reveals her identity to the Padre and tells him it was love and gratitude for her rescuer that induced the deed. The Indians, seeking the life of the boy who killed Romero, are stopped at the door of the church by the old Padre, who tells them "The crime was committed before the church portals, it is for the church to punish."

This story is founded upon an early legend of San Louis Rey Mission told by the Indians of Paula. The exterior shows the mission as it stands today. While the interior is an exact replica even to the reproduction of the crude Indian designs and paintings on the wall. The scenes about the old Spanish house were taken at Gunga Ranchero, an old Spanish home four miles from the Mission. This old house is one of the historical landmarks of Southern California and has been in the hands of the original family from the time it was built until the present day.

BIOGRAPH.

THE INDIAN BROTHERS (July 17).—A renegade Indian seeks admission into the tribe, and the chief in scorn offers him a squaw's dress, which means at the same time an insult and a denial of his request. The renegade for revenge slays the chief, who, through illness, is unable to defend himself. The renegade escapes and some of the tribe signal distress to the brother of the slain chief, who is out on a hunting trip. The brother, returning to the camp, swears over the body of the chief to bring the perpetrator of this crime back and to justice. On his way the renegade steals a horse, and for this is pursued by another tribe of redmen, who catch him just as the brother comes up. The chief's brother claims the culprit, and offers to fight for him. He wins and the renegade misconatruing his act, is profuse in his tanks for his rescue, but it is not long before he realizes why he has been rescued, for when taken back to the funeral pile of the chief, he pays the penalty.

THE GHOST (July 20).—A ghost has been the regular nightly visitor at a certain house so long that the occupants have gotten used to it. Three crooks, reading an account of it in the newspaper, decide, each unknown to the other, to go and impersonate the ghost long enough to rob the house, knowing that the occupants will take no heed of the presence of the ghost. The scheme might have worked, but there were too many playing the game, so one landed in the "cooler."

JINKS JOINS THE TEMPERANCE CLUB (July 20).—Mrs. Jinks forces henpecked Jinks to join the temperance club, and she, leaving home for a couple of days to attend a convention of the W. T. L., enjoins him to be faithful to his pledge. The boys of the Social Club call and bring their own drink, which gets poor Jinks in bad for a time. A satisfactory explanation from one of the boys restores Jinks to the good graces of his wife and the other members of the Temperance League.

VITAGRAPH.

TREASURE TROVE (July 25).—Patience and Anne, two spinsters of the old school, of aristocratic birth, have managed to keep up appearances under very trying conditions and with limited means, until they are reduced to such circumstances they are obliged to sell their household furnishings, of antique pattern, to raise the necessary "wherewithal" to live and pay the mortgage off the old home. They place a sign on the outside of their house, advertising the antiques for sale, and with sad hearts await prospective purchasers.

A wealthy man and his wife are passing in their automobile, seeing the card on the house, enter the hall, select the choicest pieces of the furniture and bric-a-brac, leaving instructions for their delivery c. o. d.

To part with the associations of a lifetime is like losing old friends, and the two sisters, with troubled minds, retire, trying to lose themselves in sleep. During the night a vision of their father, whose portrait hangs in the parlor, appears to Patience, in a dream, and leads her to a secretaire or desk in which is hidden a document giving full instructions about a treasure hidden in the garden of their home. Unconscious of what has happened in reality, she goes back to bed.

In the morning when they come down to the old reception room they find the desk open and the secret packet disclosed with its contents. They withdraw the document, and learn of the hidden treasure, which they soon unearth in the garden and find themselves possessed of plate and coin sufficient to move the mortgage and make them comfortable for the rest of their lives, without disposing of any of their much-prized belongings.

SHE CAME, SHE SAW, SHE CONQUERED (July 26).—Rose Leigh is a young school teacher. She sees a paragraph in the paper, saying that in a certain small village they have had in six months, three teachers (men), and all have left because the boys are so unruly and impossible. She resolves to try the experiment of giving them a woman teacher, and applies for the situation.

The trustees of the school, who are at their wit's end, gladly accept the offer. She arrives, and when the bad boys led by Hank and Bill prepare to give the new teacher a warm reception, they are astonished and dumbfounded when they find it is a woman. By force of will and stern discipline she gets the school in order and wins the love of all the scholars.

She becomes particularly interested in Jack Hally, a pupil who is struggling hard to get a good education, make a name in the world, and prepare a home for his sweetheart, Prudence. Her interest in Jack is misunderstood by the boys, who think he is in love with her. Hank, who admires her himself, gets up a vigilance committee, seizes on Jack when returning with Prudence from a lesson with Rose, drags him off to the wood and is about to inflict condign punishment on him, when Rose appears on the scene berating the boys soundly for their conduct. Makes them release Jack and apologize to him.

Six months later she resigns. Scholars and trustees alike try to keep her, but her fiance, Herbert, arrives on the scene, thy see the reason for her resignation, give her three hearty cheers and wish her joy in her new life, as she starts away on the departing train, with her intended husband.

THE QUEST OF GOLD (July 28).—The siren call to the wild life of the gold fields is fraught with wonderful promise and much uncertainty. The lucky are the few, and the disappointed many. As we watch the men of grit start out and pursue their way on dog sleds and snow shoes, climbing the northern Alps of Alaska, frequently swallowed up by the yawning canyons, snow-lined like whited sepulchres or dropping dead from exposure and fatigue by the wayside, we readily agree that they deserve all the good fortune they may acquire.

There are no homes in these parts and no conveniences, no machinery for mining their claims here; they are obliged to whipsaw and hew from the trees of the forset these necessaries—all of the crudest construction, but very essential to their achievements. A log cabin is a palace, a tent is a shelter and a refuge from the severity of the weather, which often blasts their fondest hopes.

THE STRATEGY OF ANNE (July 29).—One little world—just two people in it—Anne and Bob, comfortably seated before the fire's glow in a little tete-a-tete, absorbed in the oblivion of love. The stern parent of the young girl enters and commands the young man to make himself scarce and keep away from the susceptible young girl until she is of more mature age. To make sure doubly sure, Anne's father sends her away to a boarding school, but not before she has acquainted Bob with the fact and tells him to follow her, that she cannot live without him.

At the Hillsdale Academy for young ladies, Anne feels like a cat in a strange garret, and refuses to be comforted. Her schoolmates notice this, as well as the extreme vigilance which the preceptress exercises over the new arrival, pursuant to the instructions of the anxious father to see that his daughter does not neglect her studies for love's young dream.

As the girls become better acquainted with Anne they learn the cause of her dejection, heartily sympathize with her and are ready to help her when Bob, faithful to his tryst, is discovered within the sacred precincts of the school, ready to do the Romeo and Juliet act at the first favorable opportunity.

Throwing a note from the window to her gallant Bob, he loses no time in following out her plans, securing a ladder down which his sweetheart is to make her way into his arms. The girls have gotten permission from the principal to have a taffy pull, and while they are engaged in this sweet occupation, Anne is making all preparations to elope with her dear Bob, and it is not long before the young couple are on their way to the parson's to be cemented together for life.

In answer to a note from the eagle-eyed preceptress, Anne's father arives upon the scene just as a policeman is trying to solve the presence of the ladder underneath the open window. The preceptress, in her nightgown, appears at the window, the father rushes into the academy and into the room where the lady in her nightie is trying to extricate herself from the several pans of taffy which the girls left to cool. At the appearance of the excited parent, the head of the school, realizing her negligee attire, tries to escape. By this time, Anne's papa has become mixed up with the taffy; in fact things become more mixed when he grasps the sticky hand of the lady and asks after his daughter. He is told that he is too late; that his daughter "has done gone and done it." The teacher rushes from the room, and the outwitted father falls down and out into a convenient chair.

ESSANAY.

HER DAD, THE CONSTABLE (July 18).—Mary Perkins, a country girl, goes to the city intending to visit friends. In endeavoring to find her way to her freud's home, she is lost and after wandering aimlessly about the streets is assisted by a young man, who is also acquainted with Mary's friends. Young Thornton soon falls in love with Mary and on the eve of her departure for home, proposes and is accepted. Mary writes to her father and mother, telling them of the engagement and that she and Tom will be married at the country home within a week. On the wedding day Tom misses his train and decides to drive out to Mary's home in his motor alone. On the way he is delayed several times by accidents and urging his car to its utmost speed, sails like a streak through the country towns, paying no attention to the various village constables who try to arrest him for speeding. Perkins, Mary's father, is the constable of their village, and when the guests are anxiously awaiting the arrival of Tom, he receives a telephone message from another constable, that a speeder is coming his way. As a result Tom is arrested, while Perkins, who has never seen Tom before, refuses to listen to any explanation. Locking the young man up in the calaboose, Perkins hurriedly returns home, when it is learned that the young man he had arrested is his prospective son-in-law. The affair ends happily enough when Tom is released and the delayed ceremony takes place.

GOD'S INN BY THE SEA (July 21).—Learning that his schooner, "Petrel," on which his five-year-old daughter, Dora, and a crew of thirty men had been lost at sea after two days out at Liverpool, Commodore Leighton, hopeful that his daughter might have been saved, offers $5,000 reward for her return. Not until ten years later, when he again advertises for the girl does he obtain any clue to her whereabouts. In the advertisement there had been a reproduced tattoo design, a duplicate of one on the girl's left ankle. Thinking that they can easily obtain the reward, a man and woman employ a young girl, on whom they place the mark of identification, but their scheme is spoiled when it is found that the tattoo mark is of a recent date. About this time a pleasure party cruising out of Liverpool, land at an unfrequented island, where Chaplain Crandal, who is a personal friend of Commodore Leighton, meets a young woman on whom he finds the tattoo mark which seems to identify her as the lost Dora Leighton. Communicating with Commodore Leighton, Crandal inquires further into the girl's history and makes certain that she is Leighton's daughter. The old commodore arrives a week later, and is satisfied that the girl is his daughter. A happy reunion takes place, followed shortly after by the marriage of Crandal and Dora.

THE OUTLAW SAMARITAN (July 22).—Unable to apprehend a certain daring outlaw, who had for the second time successfully held up an express train, the general manager of the road employs the services of a well-known detective to hunt down the bad man. Clarington, the detective, visits the scene of the hold-up, and decides that the outlaw must still be in the vicinity and resolves to make a thorough search of the country close by. Stumbling along on top of a high cliff, leading his horse by the bridle, the detective slips and rolling to the bottom finds that he has dislocated his ankle and that he is unable to walk. Not one-quarter of a mile away, young Jack Mason, the outlaw, is filling a bucket at the spring, when he hears the distant cry for help. Hurrying to the scene of the accident, Mason carries the wounded detective to his shack, and binding up the wounded leg, tells him that he may stay with him until able to go on his way again. Mason is suspicions of the stranger, and when he finds the detective asleep, searches his pocket and finds a warrant for the arrest of himself. Not trusting the detective, Mason obtains the latter's revolver and taking the cartridges out, pulls out the lead and substitutes a light coating of wax. Later, when Clarington is able to be up again he endeavors to arrest Mason, who refuses to hold up his hands and Clarington fires. Of course he is not hurt, and quickly drawing his own gun, Mason covers the detective, and securely binding his hands, leads him out of the house, ties him to a tree and threatens to shoot him. Six shots fired at the detective's heels, thoroughly unnerves Clarington, who, when released, drops on the ground in agony of fear. Mason, laughing, throws the detective his empty gun, turns and walks away. Clarington summoning his strength, rises to his feet and runs fearfully away.

AT THE GRINGO MINE (July 27).—The workingmen were discontented. They had read how trades had secured an increase in wages by striking, and decided to use the same tactics if necessary. A committee was chosen and went before the owner of the mine, but he would not grant their demands. Then the foreman was chosen to intercede for the men, and his failure to obtain the raise in salary led to a tragedy, for it was known that he cherished a secret love for the mine owner's daughter, and his failure was mistaken for false play.

Accordingly, the foreman was made a prisoner and the men instigated a hunt for the owner, who by the way, had refused his consent to the marriage of his daughter and the foreman, believing that the latter was in league with the workingmen.

The owner was dragged from his home and both he and the foreman were taken to a lonely spot in the woods. They were bound and gagged and tied to a stake. A powder keg was placed beneath them with wires running to a battery, by which it was to be set off.

Meanwhile the mother, who had passed her husband on the road in the hands of the villainous miners, rushed to her house and arrived exhausted, only able to tell Edith the daughter, what was happening before fainting. The plucky little girl knew what well to do. She mounted hastily and rode with all speed to save her lover and her father. On the hill the men were drawing lots to determine which of them should set off the dynamite. Bill Ford drew the marked paper, but was not overzealous about his task. He delayed—delayed. His hand was clutching the igniter, but still he delayed. A drink of whiskey, he asked, but the men refused, and soon there was a fight.

Edith rode like mad, and had just untied and released the prisoners when the charge exploded. The men, in their struggle, had fallen upon the battery. They fled.

In his flight, Ford came upon the foreman and the owner. He was stupified. He could not believe his eyes, but when finally convinced of their reality, begged forgiveness. The men were pardoned their villainous acts, for the father had learned that the foreman was a square man and as such, deserving of his daughter. If not of salaries, there was a raising of hats at the Gringo Mine at news of the betrothal.

THAT CITY FELLER (July 24).—Our hero is first introduced to us in a city club room, where, thoroughly disgusted with himself, and broke, through his folly, he makes the manly resolution to straighten up and go home.

The only articles of value left after his last night at the club, are his watch and ring. These he determines to sacrifice, and deposits them with Uncle Ikey, for fifty dollars, which he invests in a railroad ticket to Reedville.

His arrival in Reedville causes quite a flutter among the female population, and he makes quite an impression on Weenie, daughter of the owner of the Commercial Hotel. She soon gave Chuck Smithers, her most devoted admirer, his "conge," for which be never forgives Moore.

Moore, in casting about for employment, meets a German grocer, who gives him work on his delivery wagon. While attending to his duties, Charles meets Judge Taylor, and later his Honor's daughter, Miss Virginia. Now, Miss Virginia had for a long time been courted, ardently but ineffectually, by Joe Muggs. But from the moment she met the "City Feller," Joe stands but a sorry chance.

A month after their first meeting, Charley, after locking up the store, walks home with Virginia, much to the chagrin of Weenie, but to the unbounded delight of Chuck Smithers, her old flame. Joe Muggs happens along, and Chuck proposes that they spy on Charley and Virginia. This spying is rewarded by the sight of Charley kissing Virginia. Chuck decides to tell this to Weenie, and does so at their first meeting, she promptly slapping his face, and Joe gives him the horse-laugh.

Bent upon ridding the village of this gay young Lothario, Joe and Chuck plot to invite him on a hunting trip with them on the following Sunday. On Saturday night the party leaves Reedville, accompanied by Charlie's dog, a collie of almost human intelligence. They take their way through the fields of mustard in a glory of yellow bloom, and, arriving at a deserted house, they decide to camp for the night, so as to get the early morning shooting.

Inside the shack, Joe, with well simulated surprise, finds a cellar. Lifting a trap door, they peer into the depths below. Suddenly Joe and Chuck push Charley, who falls, dumbfounded, into the dark hole. The two scamps drag the cover over the cellar and tell Charley if he will leave Reedville and promise not to implicate them in this deed, they will let him out. They now proceed to nail down the trap. The dog, however, is not idle, but breaks from the shack and runs to town.

The next morning the grocer, wondering at Charley's non-appearance, is attracted by the strange behavior of the dog, and at last determines to follow him. He takes his hat, and lead by the collie, starts down the street. On the way he meets Judge Taylor and Virginia, and tells them of Charley's disappearance and the dog's action. They decide to go with him, and in front of the grocery they find the marshal and several others, who join them.

Meantime, Chuck and Joe return to the old house to see if their captive is ready to come to their terms. He will not agree to their proposal and is thrust back into the cellar, almost frozen from the cold night air.

The dog leads the crowd a long chase through the village, out into the open country and through the yellow mustard fields.

Chuck and Joe try once more to make Charley come to terms, but he is obstinate in his refusal. Angrily they thrust him back, and, as they start to nail the door down, the crowd, lead by the dog, and headed by the marshal, burst in. Hearing the crowd, Charley shouts to them. While the marshal covers the offenders, several others tear up the trap door.

Charley, weak, cold and soiled, is helped out, and denounces his assailants, who are led away prisoners. Chuck and Joe warm a cell in the lock-up, while Virginia, Charley and the collie form a happy group.

THE SHERIFF OF TUOLUMNE (July 25).—Rev. Kirby, the Sheriff of Tuolumne, and Joe Standing, a young prospector, are suitors for the hand of Lucy Hanford. She shows her preference for Joe, and the sheriff retires, heavy hearted, leaving the younger man a clear field.

Joe's untiring search for gold is rewarded by the locating of a rich pocket, and in a mad rush to the assayer's office, he trips and tumbles in the village street, spilling some of the valuable dust.

Cal. Birch and "Boots" Rooney, a couple of claim jumpers, who have recently drifted into Tuolumne, see the accident, and realizing the value of the new find, plot to obtain possession of the claim. They follow Joe to the scene of his new found wealth.

During a struggle for possession of Joe's gun, "Boots" fires at Joe from behind a tree. The bullet misses its mark, but kills his own companion, Cal. Birch.

"Boots" rushes upon the scene and accuses the bewildered Joe of murdering his friend. The young miner, thoroughly frightened, has his hands tied by the cunning "Boots," and is marched into the village at the point of a gun. A mob has gathered and are about to lynch the young prospector, when the Sheriff intervenes. At this point, Joe slips his bonds and escapes, the mob following in pursuit.

Joe throws the mob off the scent and takes refuge in Lucy's home, where he is later located by the sheriff. Lucy pleads for her lover's life and the sheriff allows him to escape the second time.

The infuriated mob hunt him down, however, and are just about to "string him up," when the sheriff, who has in the meantime learned of Joe's innocence, dashes in, saves Joe's life and captures the real scoundrel, "Boots." Young Standing, in his gratitude, repays the sheriff by retiring from the race for Lucy's affection.

THE RUBBER INDUSTRY ON THE AMAZON (July 25).—The first scenes show how the rubber tree is tapped in the early morning, and how the sap is gathered at noon. Then come scenes showing how the sap is congealed in the smoke from nuts of palm trees, until it becomes what the natives term a "biscuit." Next we are shown views of the world's largest rubber market, Manaos, Brazil, twenty-three hundred miles from the mouth of the Amazon. Here the biscuit is searched thoroughly for impurities. The last scene shows the receiving and packing of the "biscuits" at the wharf.

THE TALE OF A SOLDIER'S RING (July 27).—In the first scene of this play, laid in the grounds of a noted and splendid Colonial mansion in Georgia, Marion Dunlap is betrothed to Robert Alroy, who places a diamond ring upon his sweetheart's finger. The Civil War has begun, and Marion returns the ring to Alroy and ends their engagement, when Alroy enlists in a Union regiment. Marion and her mother visit Miss Carrington, at Philamont, in Virginia. The fortunes of war brings Alroy's regiment near Philamont. In a skirmish with Confederate troops, Alroy's reconnoitering party is annihilated, and Alroy takes refuge in the Carrington mansion. Confederate officers make their headquarters in the same house.

Hidden in the fireplace, Alroy hears the Confederate officers discuss their plans, and when they go out to dinner, he secures their campaign map and escapes to the woods. Chased and severely wounded by Confederate patrols, Alray re-enters the Carrington mansion. Marion finds her former lover in a swoon, and assisted by Abraham, the negro butler, she secretes him under the bed in her room. When the pursuing Confederates enter and question her, Marion answers that the "Yank is not there. Later, in dressing Alroy's wound, the girl finds the missing map. She denounces Alroy as a spy nad holds him up with his own revolver. Alroy faints, and Marion, touched by his condition, helps him to escape after she has returned the stolen map. Peace, which makes ours a reunited country, restores Marion to her lover, and in a beautiful, romantic scene, Alroy again places the ring upon the finger of his sweetheart.

EDISON.

THE DOOMED SHIP (July 28).—Dick, a sailor lad, woos and wins Mabel, the daughter of a hard, miserly shipping merchant. Dick, in order to get some money before getting married, secures a position as mate on a coasting vessel. The ship happens to belong to his prospective father-in-law, who has received a report that she is in very bad condition and must not leave port. He pays little attention to this report, and lets her sail. But before doing so, he writes a note to his future son-in-law, to come and see him. Dick also receives a letter from Mabel, to meet her before he sails. He pays no attention to the old man's letter, and after leaving his sweetheart, sails away.

The report reaches the old miser that ship and crew have been dashed to pieces. It kills the old miser, and almost kills his daughter. As luck would have it, Dick is the sole survivor. He finds his sweetheart at their trysting place, brooding over her loss. This is suddenly dispelled by her lover's strong arms about her. It is needless to say that they are eventually married.

THE YOUNGER BROTHER (July 25).—Two brothers are strongly attached to each other. The elder man has always looked after his brother. One day, he asks him to take a hand in a game of cards. He comes out the winner, but this game leads to his downfall. He cannot give up gambling, and loses all his money.

One day at the club he notices his brother's prospective father-in-law take out a check book to write a check, when he is suddenly called into the next room. While he is away, the young man tears a blank check out of the book.

The next day the cashier of the bank calls upon the merchant and shows him a check signed with his name. He pronounces it a forgery, and at once suspects that his daughter's lover has a hand in it. The elder brother, feeling that he is indirectly responsible, says he is the author of the forged check. He loses his sweetheart. The young girl, gathering all her presents together that he had given her, discovers a letter in which her sweetheart says that he is worrying over his younger brother's loses at cards. In an instant she jumps at the right conclusion, and everything ends happily.

BOB AND ROWDY (July 26).—Bob and his dog Rowdy are inseparable companions, but, owing to Rowdy's propensity for mischief, such as wiping his muddy paws upon the bed, tearing up a new Spring hat belonging to Bob's sister and generally creating havoc throughout the house, Bob's mother decides to get rid of him.

While Bob is at school she gives Rowdy to the milkman, who carries him off in triumph.

Bob returns from school and his first thought is of his pet. He calls and whistles, but Rowdy does not respond. After a vain search through the house he tries the street. Here he is informed of his mother's transaction with the milkman by his little friend next door. Bob at once prepares to trail his four-footed pal. From a bill in the kitchen he learns the milkman's address, then breaking open his savings bank and taking his savings, he starts on his journey. He finally locates the milkman's house and after a few minutes of whistling and caling, Rowdy rushes pell mell into his arms, trailing a broken rope as evidence of his struggle in answer to his master's call.

Bob now decides to lay his course to the wild and woolly West. Nobody loves him and his dog so they might as well go away. He stops at a small post office and writes a postal card to his parents, saying that he and Rowdy are on their way out West to catch bears for the Zoo and bids them farewell. Not wishing to cause them unnecessary worry, he sends the card by special delivery and trudges on his way.

Meantime the household has been thrown into an uproar over Bob's disapearance and a thorough search fails to uncover any clew. Suddenly a boy delivers the postal card and taking the postmark as a clew, his father and mother hurry away in their automobile. Arriving at the post office they learn that Bob has been there and hurry away in the direction he was last seen going. Bob, not accustomed to long trips afoot, soon becomes tuckered out and along toward sunset, succumbs to fatigue and stops to rest. A few minutes later he is sound asleep by the roadside with faithful Rowdy keeping watch over his master.

Here his parents find him. All is forgiven and they hustle him into the automobile, leaving poor Rowdy out in the cold, but Bob refuses to desert his little comrade and a compromise is affected by a promise to Bob to restore Rowdy to his former position as a member of the household.

THE HAIR RESTORER AND THE INDIANS (July 26).—A small theatrical company of barnstormers find themselves stranded in the far West.

The manager of this unfortunate troupe, a philosophical and inventive sort of genius, equal to any emergency, immediately plans to embark in the so-called "Medicine Show" business. So assembling his actors under a tent he proceeds to compound and bottle what he is pleased to call "Doctor Bunion's Hair Restorer," guaranteed to grow hair on bald heads. Considering that he as well as his actors are quite bald, the absurdity of it becomes apparent. However they are all provided with long haired wigs, giving them the appearance of having a luxuriant growth of hair. When all is ready, they open their tent to the public, giving a free performance and attracting the usual crowd, including several Indians from the reservation.

Business is not very encouraging until the Indians, by sense of smell, discover the principle ingredient of the hair restorer is alcohol, which to them means "fire-water." As the law is rather stringent regarding the sale of liquor to Indians, they embrace the opportunity, buying up all the hair restorer on hand, and proceed to their camp, where they pronounce it to be "good medicine," and indulge in a grand pow-wow. The medicine fakers having sold out, proceed to the next town by wagon. En route they meet the Indians, who, having imbibed too much hair restorer, see a chance

ECLIPSE.

AN AMATEUR SKATER (July 26).—Roller skates on the feet of an amateur have always furnished spectators with a great deal of amusement.

In this film the victim of the unmanageable rollers, aided by trick photography, does many impossible things, which prove immensely amusing.

SATAN ON A RAMPAGE (July 26).—The "Evil Spirit" feels dull in his realm and resolves upon enjoying himself on earth. He leaves his depths and begins his vacation, playing numerous pranks upon humanity. Finally he invades a wedding party and carries away the bride. He is followed by the entire company, and after exciting incidents, escapes to his dark realm with the bride.

GAUMONT.

A FAVORING CURRENT (July 25).—Before sailing for America, George Blake, who is in love with his cousin Jane, meets her in the park, and she bids him adieu and promises that she will always love him. The boat on which he sails is lost with all hands, and Jane marries. In spite of family ties, her heart is still sore for George. Slipping up to her rooms, she gets a packet of letters from George. These she takes into the park and reads them through. Her husband is making paper boats for the amusement of the little girl; the supply of paper runs short and the child snatches up one of the letters and runs off with it. The father merely takes the letter and without glancing at it, folds it into the form of a paper boat, which he places in the water, where a favorable stream carries it beyond possibility of mischief. The past is buried and life resumes its usual course.

ST. MALO AND THE ENGLISH CHANNEL (July 25).—An excellent travelogue presenting scenes familiar to most tourists to the British Isles and France. It is a picturesque French seaport town on the channel, situated on a granite island which is connected by a narrow causeway to the mainland of France.

A SOCIETY MOTHER (July 25).—Madame Tabor, anxious that her daughter should make a good match, takes her to the Ambassador's ball, where she is introduced to a wealthy suitor, by whom she is much admired. She, however, is by no means attracted toward him, and repulses his overtures. On his telling her mother that he can make no headway, she tells him to leave the matter in her hands and has a distressing interview with the daughter, who is finally talked into submission. Shortly afterwards, the couple are formally engaged. Fifteen days later, the broken-hearted daughter, unhappily married, is reading a number of letters from her friends offering congratulations upon her supposed good fortune, when her husband comes home intoxicated and uses her badly. She leaves him and goes home, where she is welcomed sympathetically by her father and sisters, but her mother is displeased at her and takes her back to the drunken husband, where for the sake of appearances, she is obliged to resign herself to the prospect of a wretched existence for the rest of her life.

JIMMIE WEARS A CROWN (Aug. 1).—A peasant has fallen asleep in his chair, when a man of high station enters, places an infant in his arms and withdraws. The peasant and his wife find a note saying that they must only surrender the child to the person who produces the other half of the medal which is suspended from the babe's neck. They adopt the infant and bring him up. Five years elapse, and Jimmie and his foster sister, Toto, are playing, when they are disturbed by the appearance of a party of nobles, who seek the missing heir to the throne. The halves of the medal are compared and Jimmie stands revealed as the king. He is removed to the position to which his rank entitles him. We next see Jimmie enter the throne-room, appareiled in his robes of state and accompanied by his courtiers. The doors are thrown open and his subjects enter to pay homage. At first King Jimmie receives them with complaisance, but soon he assumes an expression of boredoom, flings down his sceptre, and diperses his attendants. That night Jimmie slips out and makes his way to his old home, where he is welcomed. When he is missed the royal household come to the cottage in their search for him. His foster sister dresses him in her clothes and the peasants assure the courtiers that the two children are their twin daughters.

AN AEROPLANE DISASTER (Aug. 1).—The film shows the failing of an aeroplane, in which Henri Manrice Berteaux, French Minister of War, was killed, and injured Antoine E. E. Monis, Premier of France, and Henri Deutsch. The flight was made near Paris, May 21, 1911.

AMBROSIO.

THE SCHOOLMASTER'S OVERCOAT (July 19).—The schoolmaster, living in poverty on his meager salary, pawns his overcoat to purchase medicine for his dying mother. The old garment has been ridiculed by the pupils, and when he appears without it one cold morning they investigate and learn the circumstances, and that the woman has died. They get together and take up a collection, each donating his treasured pennies, and buy the coat back and present it to their teacher.

ITALA.

TOTO—ENTHUSIAST FOR NEW FASHION (July 15).—Toto becomes enraptured with the bloomer dress, and determines to marry a girl wearing the sensible costume. His investigations result in hilarious scenes, ending with a sound thrashing at the hands of a bearded Turk carrying a sunshade, whom Toto mistakes for his ideal, wearing baggy, silken trousers.

A REVOLVER RETURNED TO ITS OWNER (July 15).—In which a man, fearing footpads, carries a revolver. He loses the weapon and a tramp picks it up and tries to give it back. The man thinks he is a robber and dashes away with the tramp in pursuit, through department stores, art stores, etc., leaving a trail or devastation.

BISON.

HER CAPTIVE (July 18).—Bob Colt's love for Bessie Scott is frowned upon by her father, and Bob goes West seeking fortune. His letters are intercepted by old Scott. Bessie's sister is wed, and the newspaper by mistake announces Bessie's name. Scott takes advantage of this, and sends the clipping to Bob. Despondent, Bob drinks and shoots a gambler whom he discovers cheating. Hard pressed by the sheriff, Bob tries to secure money to get away, and holds up the telegraph office. Bess has gone West looking for him and is the station agent. In the darkness he does not recognize her and she shoots him. The posse arrives and she hides him under a table. Bess and Bob escape, get married and live happily.

RELIANCE.

THE ANGEL (July 15).—A poor widower with a number of children adopts a girl from an orphan asylum and she proves to be a ministering angel, cleaning up the squalid home and caring for the children. She disobeys the man and he returns her to the asylum. A wealthy woman adopts her, and when lavished with riches and affection the widower is taken seriously ill and the children are in despair, she answers their plea and goes to them, nursing the sick man back to health and winning his gratitude. She declines the rich woman's solicitations to live with her again, and casts her lot with the motherless children.

A FOREST ROMANCE (July 19).—Tired of the solitude of the forest, and yearning for the city, a woman yields to temptation and elopes with a handsome stranger hunting in the vicinity. Her husband, a grim, stern trapper, takes up their trail, bent on vengeance. The elopers become lost, and having no ammunition, are nearly starved. The man regrets his action, and when the woman is terribly injured by falling over a cliff he deserts her. The husband meets the man, and the latter swears he has not seen the wife, and is given food. The woman drags herself, inch by inch, to the very brink of a mountain stream, her parched and fevered lips longing for the water which she cannot reach, and passes away in a sensational scene.

ECLAIR.

THE PRETTY LADY OF NARBONNE (July 24).—Count Bertrand admired the pretty daughter of a shepherd and was willing to bask in the sunshine of her smiles, but preferred not to marry the girl, as his union with a peasant might bring disgrace to his family and himself.

But the good King, Rene, taking in the situation at a glance, ordered Bertrand to marry the shepherdess, and the Count, fearing his majesty's displeasure, consented to the ceremony in private, but later refused to acknowledge her publicly.

In spite of the girl's entreaties, Bertrand goes to war. Before leaving he tells his wife that so soon as she is able to secure a ring which he wears on his finger, then only will he publicly acknowledge her.

The peasant-wife swears to conquer the Count and, woman-like, proceeds at once to gain the desired end. Joining him at camp she learns he is infatuated with a young woman of high rank who, however, does not return his affection.

Taking fresh courage, the wife-in-name-only seeks out this woman and tells her story. The heart of her listener is touched and her aid is won, whereupon a social affair is arranged, to which Bertrand is invited as the guest of honor.

Thinking himself specially favored, the Count is for the moment thrown off his guard and readily allows the clever hostess to remove his ring from his finger. She contrives to transfer the much-wanted jewel to the waiting wife, who brings it in triumph to her husband, the Count.

Realizing he has been outwitted, and recognizing his wife's cleverness, he finds he really loves her and willingly proclaims her The Lady of Narbonne—his wife.

IMP.

WON BY A FOOT (July 24).—Woman with attractive looking hosiery, boots and lingerie is followed by a man, whose shoes and hose show refinement.

There is a short walk and a tramp's feet are shown on a bench. Tramp is discovered by a policeman and is given the "hot foot" treatment and runs, bumping into the woman. He is slugged by the gallant and then chased by a policeman. Tramp runs up an alley followed by the guardian of the public safety. The copper evidently tires of the chase and seeks a saloon to quench his thirst.

The woman seats herself on a park bench and admires the scenery. She is joined by the masher, who seats himself beside her. The man edges over toward her and she naively moves away. This is followed by a gradual understanding and the couple move toward one another, being mutually attracted.

There is a season of foot flirtation, which is ludicrous in the extreme. It is a new language, but is perfectly understandable, and speaks volumes, without improper suggestion. Hunger is depicted by the foot signs and the couple arise, two souls with a single thought (or foot) and they move away, evidently favorably impressed with each other.

The scene reverts to a restaurant, where the obsequious waiter is shown catering to their wants and hunger is apparently appeased, if the foot movements are any criterion by which to judge. At a stage in the luncheon, by clever manipulation of the camera, the full length figures of the diners are shown and there is something of a surprise in store for the audience.

SCIENCE (July 24).—Dr. Crawford and his wife, with their little daughter, Elsie, are at home amusing themselves with the Scotch collie puppy, Imp, when another doctor is announced and he is shown an article in a newspaper which describes the providential rescue from drowning of the doctor's child by Lassie, the mother of Imp. Lassie comes in and is admired. Two more physicians arrive and announce that they have come to try an experiment with a newly discovered anesthetic.

Dr. Crawford has a guinea pig, on which the experiment is to be tried, but it is discovered the animal has died, and the men of medicine are in a quandary. It is finally decided to use Imp, the puppy, for the experiment, against the mild protest of Elsie.

The puppy is placed on the operating table in the laboratory, with the mother dog in an adjoining room, apprehensive. She begs piteously for them to release her offspring. The puppy dies under the experiment and Lassie is admitted to the laboratory. The mother wails dolefully. Elsie comes on the scene and her grief over the loss of the puppy is inconsolable. The doctors are saddened, Dr. Crawford and his wife endeavoring to comfort the child.

The gardener digs a grave and the sorrowing procession goes out to bury the dog. Lassie sees the grave dug, following the gardener about in a way that is almost human. She goes to the laboratory and then to the garden. She sees the clods placed over the body of her puppy and returns with the saddened physicians and the inconsolable child and then trots sorrowfully to the grave and approaches it mournfully, places her paws on it in an attitude of prayer—alone with her dead—her grief being pitiful to witness.

THE LINEMAN (July 27).—A business man, who resides in a suburban town, is telephoned by his wife that burglars are gaining an entrance to his home. He instructs his wife by telephone and then charters a special locomotive to carry him home. A lineman, locating "trouble" for the telephone line, taps the wires and overhears the conversation. He hastily climbs down the pole and pressing an automobile into service, speeds to the scene of trouble, arriving in the nick of time, assisting in arresting the butler and his accomplice, the burglar. The heroic lineman is rewarded by the gift of the doll of the little daughter. The husband arrives on the scene, thankful that assistance reached his wife so promptly.

THANHOUSER.

THE SMUGGLER (July 25).—An old man has an ingenious plan to circumvent the customs officials and for a time it works like a charm. Officers and sailors on various transatlantic liners, who are in the gang, are given in Europe rare gems and laces, which they are to bring to America.

The ordinary methods of smuggling by members of the crews being well guarded against, the men do not dare to bring the valuables into port

The famous and popular Imp dog, "Lassie," will make a tremendous hit with your patrons by her almost human acting in the Imp release of Monday, July 24th. It is called and is one of the strongest arguments ever put forth on the subject of vivisection. It is pathetic to a high degree, and, as an old showman says, "tears coin as much money as laughter for the showman." Tell your exchange you want "Science" for an early booking. On the same reel you'll get "Won by a Foot," a short bit of ridiculous and unique comedy that will fool you all until the very last few feet have been "run off." Then on Thursday, July 27th, we release a melodrama called and, believe us, it is a meller-drammer that will hit the bull's-eye plump in the center. It will give you all the excitement you want on one reel of film. The situations are so tense and the climax so dramatic that the best description ever written wouldn't do justice to it. Get this film or know the reason why!

"SCIENCE"

with them. But they encase them in lifebelts, and on nearing the coast near Fire Island they keep a close watch out for the racing yacht which the old man owns. The rest is easy. The life-belt is slipped overboard, the men on the boat pick it up and land at their little village, from where the jewels are taken to the city.

The old man has two nieces, who are orphans, and dependent upon him. He decides that the elder girl shall take part in the crime, hoping that if anything goes wrong, she may be the one to suffer, rather than he. And although the girl did not like the task, the fact that smuggling was a crime was not thoroughly clear to her, and for the sake of her little sister she consents to take the boat out and pick up the jewels.

Unfortunately, the United States district attorney's attention has been directed to the gang. An enemy of the old man sends an anonymous letter, calling the law's notice to the boat, and a detective is sent to investigate. He manages to secure a position on the boat as sailor, and his very first cruise proves that the charges were well founded.

The detective and his police allies confront the old man just after the jewels have been turned over him. The girl is in tears when the detective appears. But he, from his place of concealment, has heard enough to convince him that she was not a willing participant in the plot.

The two are arrested, but the detective, at the girl's plea, takes care of the little sister. He places her with his old nurse, who owns a farm in the country, and who promises to give the child a mother's attention. Then the detective tells the district attorney the facts in the case and pleads for the release of the girl. He shows that the blame was not really hers, but belonged to the wicked relative who practically forced her to commit wrong. And the law was merciful.

Some time later the detective met his one-time prisoner again, but this time he was the prisoner, for she bound him with the invisible chains of love.

A DOLL'S HOUSE (July 28).—Nora, the only child of a kindly old man, never "grew up" so far as he could see. He treated her "like a doll," as she said later when her eyes were opened, but her girlhood was happy and carefree. She never had opinions, those of her father were enough for her, and when he suggested that she marry Torval Helmer, a young man of probity, she was not consulted. Neither did she object, for that is not one of a doll's privileges.

The husband, as did the father, treated Nora like a doll. It never occurred to him that she was a being with a mind and intelligence, but he was fond of her, in his own superior, condescending way. When he was taken sick, he thought it was very kind of her old father to give them the money that paid for a health trip to Italy. He did not know that his "doll wife" had borrowed the cash from a money lender, and to get it had to forge her father's name. Her excuse, perfectly reasonable to her doll's mind, although not legal, was that her father would have signed had it not been that he was fatally ill at the time. And the money was needed, as the doctors told her that without the trip Torval would certainly die.

But the artifices of the "doll wife" was a closely guarded secret for many years. She worked late at night, sewing, to pay off the load of her debt under which she labored. And the years passed on, and children came, and Torval grew in wealth and knowledge, but he never once realized that Nora had troubles, and anxiety, simply because she bore her cross with a smiling face.

When Torval became the manager of a bank, the crisis came. One of the clerks was lazy and irresponsible, and the new manager discharged him. And he was the man who had loaned Nora the money.

He saw a chance to get his place back, and called upon Nora, threatening her with exposure unless he was restored to duty. Then for the first time, she realized that she had committed, what in the eyes of the law was a crime. In her pitiful, doll like way, she tried to get her husband to restore the clerk to duty, but was rebuffed. For he could not see what right she had to interfere in his business. He was not really angry, just provoked.

The clerk carried out his threat, but Nora, for a time was able to keep her husband from reading the letter. Then she decided to let the exposure come, believing that the husband who had guided and petted her for years, would, to clear her, take the blame upon himself. But Torval showed that she had judged him wrongly. His terror was aroused, not for fear of consequences to her, but because of what might happen to himself. And the eyes of the "doll wife" were opened.

When the danger of exposure had passed away, through the eleventh hour repentance of the clerk, Torval was ready to forgive and forget. But Nora was not. She saw how her life had been spoiled from infancy, how she had been suppressed and ignored, and resolutely left her home to start life anew and alone.

The pleadings of her husband, and the thoughts of her children did not move her. They were all a part of the "doll's house" and its furniture, and they had no part in the life of a woman, so she put them away from her. And Torval, too late, realized the fault was his. She tells him that some day she may return "if the miracle happens, making me a different woman, and you a different man." He lives on, striving for the miracle.

POWERS.

A MORAL COWARD (July 18).—May Wright is the loved wife of an army officer, who is famed for his strict disciplinary methods. They are an ill-matched couple, for she is as impulsive and indiscreet as he is sullen and tyrannical. Admired by all and the life of the post, she has many admirers, among them being Ralph Armitage, a romantic young artist. Their friendship ripens into love until they have secret meetings. One day, while they were conversing in her boudoir, her moody husband was on a long hunting trip. Unexpectedly returning, he was near his home when he met a posse of rural peace officers searching for a thief. Much to the husband's surprise, the tracks led to his home and they enter, believing the criminal hidden in the house.

The wife and artist hear the approach and fearing his presence may compromise her, he hides. The house is searched and Ralph is found. The wife to save her honor, denies knowledge of him, and Ralph in order to clear her name, confesses to being the thief they are in search of. Although innocent, he is sentenced to five years at hard labor. May, the moral coward, never forgets this great sacrifice and the knowledge of an innocent man self-branded for life in order that she may be clear, oppresses her and she is as miserable as the poor prisoner. Five years later, while touring in her car she passes some convicts breaking rocks, and to her great despair she recognizes the self-sacrificing lover. Soon after he dies in jail after many years of silence, never complaining, and happy in the thought of having saved the one he loved. He was pointed out to visitors as the silent prisoner.

The wife read of his death and the husband noticing her great agitation, questions her and she confesses.

He is relentless, and tells her even if he could forgive her deceit her moral cowardice is unpardonable.

LITTLE GIRL (July 22).—Jack Allan and Ned Austin, sworn friends, both love the same girl. Ned proposes and Jack, allowing his friendship for Ned to govern the inclinations of his heart, remains silent. Ned marries and Jack in an effort to forget his sorrow applies himself to business with such fervor that he is soon a wealthy man, but his financial success does not cause him to forget the girl he loved, and although many desirable girls try to win him, he is indifferent to all and is known as a confirmed bachelor. Ned does not appreciate his wife, and deserts her and her little girl. The abandoned wife soon dies and the child is taken to an orphanage. Jack is alone with memories of the past linked to the present by a photograph of his lost love. He is very lonely and asks to adopt a child. A little girl is sent to him from the orphanage and she soon becomes the baby ruler of the mansion. She appoints herself guardian over her adopted father and always asserts her sweet tyranny. One night, while tidying his desk, the treasured photograph is found and she cries: "This is my mamma!" Jack is surprised, for he adopted the little girl under her asylum name. A few questions and he sees he has the child of his lost sweetheart in his arms. Jack sits before the fire in meditation, then gazes with reverence upon the sleeping child and muses upon the unsuspected benefits of Providence.

LUX.

PLUCKY BILL (July 21).—Bill is ordered by his wife to carry three large hat-boxes, each containing the latest creation, to the milliner's, and departs on his errand. Unhappily he collides with a gentleman sitting at a café, and in his confusion upsets tables, chairs and glasses, bringing down the wrath of the proprietor upon his head. Picking himself up, Bill walks off, and is set upon by two roughs, who gave him a bad time of it. A "strong" man giving a performance in the street arouses Bill's curiosity, and the little comedian again has to go "through it." By this time the hats are crushed out of all resemblance to respectable headgear, and Bill, crestfallen, returns home. His account of his troubles infuriates his wife, who, dragging Bill after her, sets out to wreak vengeance upon her husband's enemies. The café proprietor is roughly treated by the lady, as are also the roughs and "strong" man. The next day Bill goes for a stroll, and so impressed is he with the quick way in which his former enemies retreat before him, that upon his return home, he assumes a truculent attitude, and impresses upon his wife the necessity of her being obedient to her "lord and master" in the future.

ONE GOOD TURN DESERVES ANOTHER (July 21).—Mr. and Mrs. Martin receive a letter from the latter's sister, asking them to receive into their family her daughter Mary. Now the good lady of the house is somewhat old-fashioned in her ideas, and when Mary arrives she quickly contrives to scandalize her aunt. Mary can play billiards, smoke cigarettes, and worst of all, flirt. This latter does not appeal to Mrs. Martin, and when she finds Mary giving her cousin Edith a lesson in the art of love-making, she promptly conducts the girl to Mr. Martin, and informs him that something must be done. So Mary is employed as a typist, and learns that the bank in which her uncle is interested has failed. She arrives home and prevents Mr. Martin committing suicide, giving him at the same time a credit note on a bank for $5,000. Taking her by the hand Mr. Martin leads her up to his wife, where Mary confesses she had pretended to be poor, because she wished the family to take her for herself; but when she had learned that her uncle was threatened with ruin she determined to reveal the fact that she had a fortune. Mrs. Martin is touched by the girl's generosity, and takes her in her arms.

NESTOR.

THE PLAINS ACROSS (July 19).—John Jasper, with his son, Bert, had gone ahead to prepare a cabin for his family, leaving his uncle, Dan Mason, to bring Mrs. Jasper and the girls. But had the boys of Allen Ranch, as they rode over the hill, not spied the prairie schooner, which Dan was driving, being attacked by the hostile chief, White Eagle, and his braves, the Jaspers, father and son, would have awaited the schooner's arrival long and in vain.

In the fight with the Redskins, which followed the boys' mad dash to their rescue, Red Wing, with the chief's son, was sorely wounded, so having climbed into their wagon, he was unknowingly borne away with the whites.

When the cabin was reached, however, and his presence learned, the men at once raised their rifles, and would have dispatched him without mercy, had not little Susie begged that his life be spared. Under the gentle care of the child and good-hearted Mrs. Jasper, Red Wing gradually recovered, and almost before Susie realized it, her dear "Injun" had given them his blessing and departed.

Finding that her pleadings to accompany her new chum met with only a stern refusal, the little girl waited until the coast was clear, then taking her doll, stole cautiously away, but although Susie took the direction which Red Wing had said their encampment lay, she was soon lost and called lustily for help.

Fortunately, an Indian maiden, who had been gathering wood, heard her cry and hurried to the child's rescue. But instead of wanting to be taken home, Susie, by giving an imitation of the war-dance, which Red Wing had taught her, finally made the Indian girl understand that she wished to go to the encampment.

In the meantime, Red Wing had arrived there just in time to prevent the old chief's taking the warpath to avenge his supposed death, and so delighted was White Eagle at his son's marvelous escape, that when Susie appeared, she was received with every possible honor. Realizing that the Jaspers would be worried at her absence, Red Wing at last coaxed the child to start back with him. However, Susie had been missed almost immediately, so Mrs. Jasper, in her husband's absence, had sent around to the other settlers, and a searching party was soon organized.

Hurrying through the woods, the men came upon the child's doll, and not far from it, the Indian girl's feather. Straightway, they made for the encampment. Fortunately, ere they could open fire, Red Wing observed them from an adjoining peak, so giving a war-cry to attract their attention, he lifted the little girl high in the air, brandishing his knife above her head in the meanwhile; for knowing that the whites would be massacred if they attacked the camp, the Indian wished to decoy them away.

An exciting chase to the cabin followed, which Red Wing won by taking a canoe, and he was already being profoundly thanked by the distracted mother, when the astonished posse arrived, to learn that the heart of a savage could also know gratitude.

MUTT AND JEFF AT THE FORTUNE TELLER'S (July 22).—Mutt and Jeff are passing down the street, talking over their troubles in general, when suddenly Mutt spies a sign: "Mme. Squee—Palmist," which makes a great hit with him. He endeavors to persuade little Jeff to go in, saying, "Why bother our heads about the future, when we can go in here and have someone tell us all we expect?" After much persuasion, he finally induces little Jeff to go in with him, but much against the will of the latter. They each have their fortune told them, Jeff first, for Mutt is not the boy to tackle any game until poor little Jeff has been a victim himself. Well, little Jeff is told a most "beautiful dream," and that all he has to do is, simply "wish." His good luck prompts Mutt to go in the "queer" room and learn his fate. He does so, and what he gets is simply awful. "He is going to die young." In fact, "when he dies he is going to lose his breath." "Mme. Squee" even tries the game of "she loves me, she loves me not," with the rose, but it always comes out bad for poor Mutt. At the conclusion of the "seance (?)," she says, "$2.00, please," which Mr. Mutt has to "cough up," for such a "bum" fortune. Of course Mutt blames the whole affair on poor little Jeff. While they are arguing, Mutt suddenly sees an imaginary object in the air, and begins to lead little Jeff a hard chsse, which ends with "I thought I saw $2.00, please." The gsme of "she loves me, she loves me not," hss made a strong impression upon poor Mutt, aud he cannot resist trying it for himself, time and time sgain. Even the beautiful pdisplay in front of the florist's falls to wreck, a regular "shower" of plants, pots, etc. The broom rack in front of the furniture store is sacrificed to Mutt's "she loves me, she loves me not." Chalrs and tables, in fact, furniture of every description, is reduced to a shapeless mass. The vegetshle desler comes into the game by his contribution of cabbages, potatoes, onions, egg plsnts, etc., and only when poor Mutt comes in contact with the butter snd egg merchant's supply of eggs, does he become reconciled to his fate, "she loves me n-i-t," for though he falls to hear, "she loves Muh," the eggs stick to him—all of them, forevermore, in spite of his vociferous disclaimer, "eggs is 'rotten' luck."

SOLAX.

ALL ABOARD FOR RENO (July 19).—Two people, a Mr. Biff and a Mrs. Howard, go to a photographer's and have some pictures tsken. After they are finished the packages are given to a mesenger, who makes a mistake in delivering the pictures, and Mr. Biff gets Mrs. Howard's picture and Mrs. Howard gets Mr. Biff's picture. The pictures are found by Mrs. Biff and Mr. Howard. The resultsnt complications can be imagined.

Then follows a still hunt on the part of the supposedly wronged husband and wife—Mrs. Biff and Mr. Howard—all over town. Finally they locate Mr. Biff and Mrs. Howard in a restaurant which they happened, by strange coincidence to enter together. The enraged husband and wife sail in and mske a scene in the restaurant, telling their supposed recreant spousces that they now have them right, and that they are going to get a divorce.

The next scene shows the quartet at the railroad ststion getting aboard the train for Reno. As they are about to enter the train the photographer's messenger rushes up, and beglnning to cry, tells them that he is very sorrow that he msde the mistake of delivering the wrong pictures to the addresses. After explanations are offered everything is merry and Mr. and Mrs. Biff and Mr. and Mrs. Howard go off arm in arm well satisfied with the way things have turned out.

SERGEANT DILLON'S BRAVERY (July 21).—The routine at Fort Winton is interrupted by a message from the paymaster stating he would be at the post that dsy to audit the accounts. The news is least welcome to Lieutenant Mason, who as disbursing officer has charge of the funds. His sporting proclivities have led him to use the funds entrusted to him. He decides to wager all on one east of the dice. Taking the balance of cash on hand he goes to a gambling resort where he loses all.

The Lieutenant's loss is witnessed by Sergeant Dillon, which heightens the bad blood already existing between the two men by reason of the Lieutenant's attention to Nina, who is Sergeant Dillon's sweetheart. The paymaster intrusts the lieutenant with the money he has brought for deposit in the safe. Mason takes advantage of a chance to rob the safe and so maneuvers that the Sergeant will be blamed for the theft. The theft is discovered and the Lieutenant's scheme of fixing the blame on Sergeant Dillon is successful. The Sergeant is placed under arrest just as word is received of an Indian outbreak. Boots and saddle is hurriedly sounded and the troops rush away from the camp.

Dillon'a little sweethart heard the news of his arrest, comes to the guard house, and releasing him, gives him her horse. Dillon gallops sfter his troops, but arrives just as the engagement is closing. Lieutenant Mason is shot by one of the Indian strsgglers. He is rescued by Sergeant Dillon and brought bsck to the post in a dying condition. Realizing thst death is near Lieutenant Mason makes a confession exonerating Sergesnt Dillon and he is restored to the arms of his sweetheart.

CHAMPION.

THE EXCHANGE (July 24).—George Thomss and Walter Burnett are chums of the bivouac and camp fire, and fate so ordains that they fsll wounded on the same field of battle. Thus it is we see them in the same hospital tent, convalescing, exhihiting for each other all the affection displayed by David and Jonathan of old. They have exchanged their life confidences again and again; and now a packet has come to George from the uncle and aunt whom he has not seen since childhood, with their photogrsphs and a ring—a signet ring that has been an heirloom in the fsmily.

George has recovered from nis wound sufficiently to tske his departure to the home of the dear friends who await his coming after all the long yesrs of sbseuce. He bids Walter an affectlouate farewell, when suddenly the hospital camp is attacked and George fslls stricken by the side of his friend. The attack is repulsed, but when the hospital surgeon responds to Walter's frantic cries, he shakes his head, and Walter mourns—for his faithful friend is apparently no more.

Left by the side of his dead friend, an evil thought takes possession of him. In an instant he hss appropriated the photos snd letters which George hss just received from the fsr away Southern home. He tries too, to take the signet ring from his finger, but in this he fails, the surgeon and others coming in on the moment.

And so when Walter presents himself at the home of his friend he is received hy them as their beloved relative; and Msrgery, the sweet-faced cousin to whom from childhood he was betrothed, accepts this turn of fate in the bliss of innocence. But George was not dead. Accidentally did they discover signs of life in the youth. But, alas! When he had fully recovered his rohust health, his memory remsined a blank. His identity wss unknown to himself and in this pcculisr state of mind he joined the Union Army.

Then the fortunes of war bring him to his old home, where Walter is enjoying his false posltion. The meeting is a great scene. The signet ring estahlishes George's identity, while Walter's consternation revealed his imposition. The happy ending may well be imagined rather than told.

AT THE TRAIL'S END (July 26).—Sheriff Willoughby is the avowed sweetheart of Ethel, the daughter of Boss Boigne, the saloon keeper. He is telling her of his love, when Portuguese Pete bresks in upon them with the tale of the murder he has witnessed. At the scene of the conflict, the Sheriff finds a mitten beside the desd man, and his hardening features indicated the enormous task awaiting.

Again at the saloon, in answer to the trembling inquiry of the saloon keper and his wife, the Sheriff sternly tells them that the murderer is their son and that he must arrest him. On fleeing from the scene, the son had hastened home and was aided by his people to escape. His safety was assured at the border, which was two hundred miles distant through ice and snow. While the Sheriff is questioning his parents, the son is skating swiftly over the ice.

At Pete's suggestion, he and the Sheriff secure ice skates wherewith to overtake the fugitive. Ethel overhears the proposed chase, and skates out before them to anticipate them and warn her brother. They are now in full pursuit following the ice cuts, which are first confusing where the girl had crossed and then again clear.

Night falls upon the fleeing man and his followers, but setting fire to a knot of pine, the Sheriff skates along with it, held low upon the ice, where shines the thin white trail of the man ahesd. Cold and starving, the Sheriff at last sees the fugitive and makes an extra spurt when he sees him fall. Barely able to reach him, the Sheriff lifts him and arrests him. With a moan, the captive turns a frozen agonized face towards the Sheriff, who looks and sees it is the woman he loves.

So at the trail'a end he picked up a little frozen body and skated over the miles of ice until her home is reached, where staggering with the warmth of the home, the old saloon keeper and his wife restore them to life and mutual happiness. And, a man in a woman's skirt crosses the border to another land, a land of judgment.

YANKEE.

THE STEPDAUGHTER (July 24).—The heroine of this story, having lost her mother when but barely more than a baby, was left to the care of her father, who, thinking that his infant daughter should have a mother's care, married a widow with an only son.

Having as he thought, provided his daughter with a mother's csre, he dismissed the matter from his mind entirely. Unfortunately for the little motherless one, the woman whom her father married had no room in her heart for her husband's daughter, and the little one became the butt of her ill-temper. Neglected, abused and beaten, the little girl seeks solace in her poorly furnished room before the portrait of her sainted mother.

With tears stresming down her cheeks, she prays for her mother to return or to take her to her heavenly home. In this pitiful attitnde the father finds her and hears from her own lips the story of her miserable existence in her own home.

Wheu confronted with the child's statements, the stepmother denies sny cruelty and excuses her treatment by pleading her desire to punish the child for her wilfulness. Having had his eyes opened, the father pays closer attention to his motherless baby, and discovers the truth at last. He orders the womsn from his home and devotes himself to his daughter.

A childish brain, full of innocence and purity can bear no ill will, and when the little girl hears from her stephrother of his mother's illness and lonesomeness, she brings about a reconciliation and is amply rewarded by the gratitude and love of her hitherto cruel stepmother.

DEPOSITED AFTER BANKING HOURS (July 28).—The hauking firm of Montford & Co., were in need of cash to tide them over a panic and save them from ruin. Temptation came in the form of a lsrge deposit made after banking hours by an old sea captain whose entire savings were put into their hands to be deposited on the morrow, in the regular way.

As it was after banking hours, the head of the banking company gave Captain Horton his personal receipt and assured the captain of a deposit slip the following day. A vicitm of heart trouble, the captain succumbs to this long drcsded disease and falls dead in the presence of the bankers. It is an easy matter to abstract the receipt from the captain's pocket and as no entry had been made, the hankers decide upon keeping the money for their own usc. Apparently satisfied, Bannister, the partner of Montford, assists in removing the body from the banking office.

The widow and daughter of the captain, knowing their father had gone to the bank to deposit a large sum, sre horrified to learn that no deposit had been made and when the body of the captain had been found there was no trace of any money, or of its deposit. Deprived of their little fortune they soon find themselves in want.

Bannister, one of the firm of Montford & Co., had gone from bad to worse, and at the end of five years had become a tramp. While lounging about the streets he protects a young girl from the assault of a thug, and upon escorting her home, discovers her to be the daughter of the old aea captain whom he had helped rob. The pitiful story of their poverty and hardships awakens in Bsnnister his manly instincts, and intent on making reparstion, he calls upon his former partner and commands him to return to the widow and daughter the sum put into their hauds by the old sea captsin. He is laughed at and threatened with arrest as a blackmaller by the head of the banking concern, but he is not frightened, as he has in his possession the receipt which his partner gave to the old sea captain, and which he had obtained before they removed the body from the office on that eventful day. His threat to make public this receipt secures for him the money at once.

The mother and daughter come at his call to the banking house and are acquainted with the fact of the injustice done them, and upon being asked their intentions as to the prosecution of the banker, leave the decision in the hands of Bannlsler, who, after a moment's hesitation, tears up the receipt and thus destroys sll the evidence of a crime committed.

SHERLOCK HOLMES, JR. (July 20).—Little Sherlock Holmes, Jr., reads of the doughty doings of his hero-god, and at once determines to become a detective himself. Providence favors him by at once giving him a mystery to solve. His father has noticed that in some weird, unaecountable fashion the whiskey in the decanter is ever vanishing, and father swears he doesn't drink it as fast as all that. So Sherlock Holmes, Jr., assigns himself the task of discovering who tampers with his father's soothing beverage. Concealed behind a table, he sees Bridget, the cook, come in and at once proceed to get on the ontside of a man's size pull on the flask. At once the embryo detective makes his report to his father, with the astounding solution of the mystery. The fsther decides to use Dr. Brown's Sure Cure for the Liquor Habit on the cook, and obtains a bottle of the fluid. This he puts in the room near the whiskey, intending to pour some in the bottle a little later. Sherlock Holmes, Jr., discovera the bottle, and follows the "Do it Now" maxim. There are friends visiting the house at the time, who are sitting on the lawn with his parents, awaiting tea which the maid is to bring them. Sherlock, Jr., pours a goodly quantity of the fluid into the tea. One of the results of taking the liquid is falling into a deep slumber, and in a few moments the host and hostess and guests are fast asleep. Then happens along Bridget'a beau, the policeman, for whose particular benefit Bridget esssys to go inside and procure a glass of "buttermilk." After imbibing, the policeman forgets all about everything except that he is awfully drowsy, and the next thing he, too, is asleep. It must have been contagious—or could Bridget not have forgotten herself?—but at any rate she, too, wanders off into the Land of Nod. Then Sherlock dons the policeman's clothes and cluh, and marches through the house, monarch of all he surveys.

At this opportune moment; two burglars arrive on tthe scene, and seeking the sleepers, think they have been transferred to Burglars' Paradise. They sneak upstairs, fill their bags with silverware and then fall for the whiskey on the table, little Sherlock watching esgerly. At last they get themselves off, followed by the creator of all the mischief, but they have not gone far when they are overcome by the liquor cure and fall in their tracks to sleep. Little Sherlock now takes the unauacles from the policeman's coat pocket, and ties both legs of the hurgiars together. In dne time the household awskes, they seek the boy, and eventually find him covering the two bnrglars, prisoners of Sherlock Holmes, Jr.

spirators. After allowing due time to elapse, the villain schemes to again get the right of entrance to his brother's house. Adopting a guise which suggests that he has come down in the world, he gets in the way of his brother's motor car and is knocked down. The brother is greatly alarmed at the mishap, and takes him home. Here the crafty fellow simulates repentance for his former conduct, and is once more received into the house. His wicked schemes soon proceed to a consummation. His hirelings lie in wait for the unsuspecting husband, who is gagged and bound and taken to a dungeon. He succeeds, however, in making his escape, and emerges by way of a chimney on the housetops. He attracts the attention of policemen, who go in and arrest the plotters, and then accompany the husband post haste to his house, where he arrives just in time to prevent further casualties.

Song Slide Releases

A. L. SIMPSON.

"It Looks Like a Good Old Summertime." Words by Ren Shields; music by Fred. Hylands; published by Hylands & Shields, New York. This is a high-class ballad of great beauty. The set of slides is composed of very daintily posed illustrations, with rich color effects. The models are extremely good looking and have done justice to Simpson's excellent photography.

"Memories of You." Words and music by Etta Hylands; published by Hylands & Hylands, New York. Another charming love song that will appeal to your audiences. The theme of the number is a lovers' wistful yearning and the melodic setting is unusually pretty. This set of slides is gorgeous and is sure to be a great winner. The coloring is exquisite.

"Oh, Tiny, Play that Traumerei." Words by J. Henry Little; music by J. E. Andino; published by the Musicians' Music Publishing Co., New York. Another hit that is sure to be in great demand. This is one of the most melodious numbers ever produced.

"There's a Dixie Girl Who's Longing for a Yankee Doodle Boy." Words by Robert F. Roden; music by Geo. W. Meyer; published by F. B. Haviland Pub. Co.

"The Owl in the Old Oak Tree." Words by Stanley Murphy; music by Ben. Hapgood Burt; published by F. B. Haviland Pub. Co.

"Can't You Take It Back and Change It for a Boy?" Words and music by Thurland Chattaway; published by F. B. Haviland Pub. Co.

"You're the Queen in the Kingdom of My Heart." Lyric by Lewis Weslyn; music by J. E. Andino; published by the Musicians' Music Pub. Co., N .Y.

The public's sentiment in favor of the Mutt and Jeff Foto-Farces is clearly mirrored in the following letter from James O. Bryson, Mgr., Laemmle Film Service, Minneapolis, Minn.

"I am happy to tell you that Mutt and Jeff is taking big in this town. My best customers who have had the first release are still asking that we return it to them, and this is the first instance I have ever run up against where a man is asking for the same picture back—even willing to run it a week later. No one ever made a similar request of me even for the Fall of Troy. Downtown here, where houses are competing against one another, the opposition is willing to run it after the first house. Our mails are full of requests for Mutt and Jeff. I merely mention this simply to let you know how well your efforts are taking in this territory. I know positively the same is all over the country, and I assure you that I am very happy indeed to see this great success."

MONOPOL FILM CO.

P. P. CRFT, Gen. Mgr. 145 W. 45t h t., N.Y.

Write to-day for territory.

The following article, which we advise you to read, appeared in the June 17th issue of The Moving Picture World: "We were favored with an advance view this week of a three-reel subject, produced by the Great Northern Company, of Denmark, entitled 'The Temptations of a Great City.' The American rights for this excellent picture have been secured by Mr. P. P. Craft, of the Monopol Film Company. The picture is one of the best-acted films that it has ever been our pleasure to witness. To those of our readers who remember that excellent Pathe picture, 'The Hand,' we would say that this Danish picture is on a par with that sterling little drama of some three years ago, which was acted by three persons in a way that has probably never been surpassed. The entire three reels of 'The Temptations of a Great City,' are acted by four strong characters, with no other characters, except an occasional lackey or policeman. The part of the waiter, who is also a money-lender to the gilded youth whom he serves, is really a masterpiece of character work. 'The Temptations of a Great City' is melodrama, pure and simple. It does not claim to be anything else. It can be called high-class melodrama. In it there are no shooting scrapes, or sensational situations of the stereotyped kind. It is a simple drama of cause and effect, well told, with surprisingly few sub-titles. The four principal characters are the money-lending waiter and his simple daughter, playing at cross purposes with a society matron and her prodigal son. The film tells, in a way, the old story about a fool and his money, or, in this case, other people's money; particularly his mother's money and the money-lender's money. He gets his spending money from the money-lending waiter. The young spendthrift pays it back by wheedling it out of his mother. This keeps up until financial matters between the families are so hopelessly snarled up that it leads to a crisis, or climax, which nothing on earth can settle except an elopement between the prodigal son and the waiter's daughter. There are many strong situations throughout the piece. The staging and photography are perfection, therefore we need not dwell on that subject. In one scene there is an ingenious mirror effect, and later on, in the same scene, a wonderful moonlight effect. The picture is entirely a studio product, hut the scenes are so interesting that the time and the place are forgotten hy the spectator, whose interest is held every moment of the time. We noticed one thing very particularly in this European picture, and that is the fact that the Europeans are 'stealing our stuff.' Ordinarily in a Danish picture one would expect the foreign style of acting, such as the shrug of the shoulders and the drag of one foot after the other, and all the rest of the stereotyped styles of the European school. The Europeans are getting wise to facial expression. If it were not for a telephone that looked like a wedding cake and a policeman with a hrass kettle on his head, no one would know that it is a foreign film. Not only that; if the Americans do not watch closely, the European actors are going to heat them at their own game of facial expression, because the four actors in this Danish film were certainly going some in the gentle art of suppressed emotion. It reminded the writer of the palmy days of the Biograph Company, when tense situations were worked up entirely with the eyes and slight movement. This film came as near to being one of the old Biograph masterpieces as anything that ever came from Europe, and it is good to ohserve that the Europeans are heginning to see some merit in the American school of acting. America is heartily sick of the shoulder-shakers, and it is possihle that Europeans are sick of it themselves. We have not said a great deal ahout the story, hecause in our opinion it is not the strongest plot that has ever been written, hut it is ordinarily good. It holds the interest like a vise all the way through, which in itself is a very strong recommendation for any film. It is not an immoral film, and yet it preaches no great moral sermon, except the old stand-bys such as the moth and the flame, the prodigal son, wine, woman and song, and all that sort of thing. But withal it is good—very good; and as those subjects never grow old, it is necessary, from time to time, to have good, fresh material touching on and appertaining to. The story is ahout a young man whose spending ahility is as large as his earning ability is small. He spends every cent he can get on gay dinner parties with the weariness that stays awake for hire. All this takes money, and he finds that it is easier to horrow money than to earn it; therefore his close connection with the fawning waiter, whose part is so very well played. In the cold, gray dawn of the morning after, the fawning waiter of the night hefore is an independent, arrogant Shylock. He assumes the airs of a hanker, and to him it is the young man's turn to cringe and beg for time. Were it not for the fact that the money-lender has a daughter, whom he houses like a bird in a cage, the spendthrift youth would probably have gone to jail. The picture shows how the miser made his great mistake hy being miserly even with his daughter. He locked the door and the bird flew out of the window. When the young man came to heg for time he found opportunity to make a conquest of the money-lender's simple-hearted daughter, which later ended in marriage. The reader will perceive in the four contrasting characters a wealth of dramatic possihilities. A plebeian, domineering waiter contrasted against an aristocratic widow; her college-bred son eloping with a bourgeois' daughter. The contempt of the aristocratic widow for her son's plebeian wife, which is further complicated by the riches heing on the plebeian side and the poverty on the patrician side, and all these conditions stirred up nicely together make 'The Temptations of a Great City' one of the strongest melodrama reels that has 'come across' in a long time. The interest is so strong that one actually becomes impatient while the reels are being changed. We would advise exhibitors to use two machines, if possible, when showing this film." The above article from The Moving Picture World is an unbiased opinion. It is reproduced herewith word for word without any attempt to "blue pencil" the weak spots nor to underline the strong points. There were one or two points not touched upon by the reviewer that it might be well to add. The tinting throughout the scenes imparts much life to this picture and makes it "snappy" all the way through. The scenic effects are natural. By natural is meant that there is no straining to appeal to the eye with a plethora of gaudy "ginger-bread" interiors made on the style of circus wagons. Where the plot calls for a "parlor fancy" the demand is met with refined taste and original arrangement. The other scenes are normal in proportion. As to the acting of the picture, there is nothing that can he said on that point that has not been already covered hy the reviewer, except to say that the actors are four of the leading players of Denmark, whose names in that country stand among the highest rank in their profession. "Temptations of a Great City" is a film that advertises well. It is one of those features that will justify a week's hooking.

It Makes Hallberg Smile

Whenever the makers of other "so-called" current saving devices wish to create an impression on a prospective customer, they claim to have replaced a "Hallberg Economizer" at such-and-such a place. When the name is given and the report traced down you will find, as I have, that the other fellow got his device in "on trial," on account of his claims. After a trial there was "nothing doing" as the superiority of the Hallberg was again demonstrated in face of such competition. I don't blame you for trying these new devices, as it costs you nothing, and I know "darn well" such trials only make you think better of the "Hallberg Economizer."

Remember That Awful Fire

that destroyed the Lakeview school house at North Collinwood, Cleveland, O., back in 1898? One hundred and seventy-four lives were lost (nearly all little children) just for lack of proper fastenings on the fire-exit doors. That couldn't have happened with the Von Duprin Self-Releasing Fire Exit Latch in use, because in that case the first child who touched the door would have opened it, just by that touch, and those precious young lives would have been saved.

Won't you try the Von Duprin now, and learn for yourself that it cannot fail? Catalog on request.

COMPENSARC

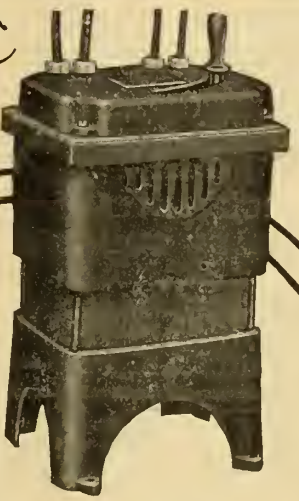
This Machine cuts 2/3 from your Light Bills



Mr. Manager

If you are on a 110 or 220 volt circuit and you are using a rheostat to reduce the voltage to 35 at the arc in your lamp, you are paying for 2/3 more "juice" than you are actually using. Can you afford to waste all this energy supplied from the line, over and above what you really need?

The Fort Wayne Compensarc saves all this waste by reducing the voltage without losing any: makes a clearer, whiter, steadier light, and eliminates all danger of fires caused by overheated rheostats.

We have a little 22 page booklet "Compensarc vs. Rheostat" that we want to send you. It will tell you plainly how you can make a big saving and a better light. Send us your name and address.

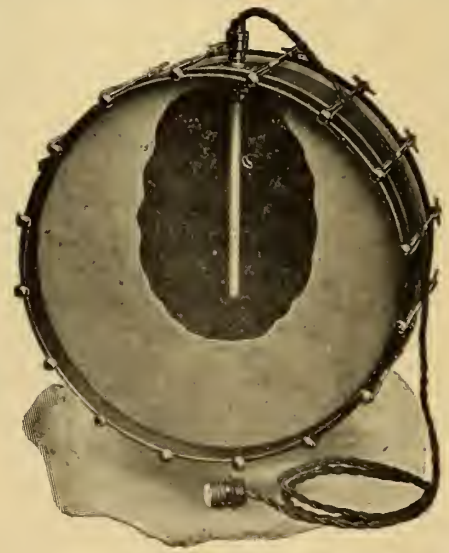
BULLETIN 31 YOURS FOR THE ASKING

GARDEN CITY FAN CO.
ESTABLISHED 1879 · Manufacturers McCormick Bldg., Chicago, Ill

KEEP YOUR DRUM HEADS DRY



The very nature of drum heads causes them to absorb moisture readily, and when the heads become damp it is an absolute certainty that your drum will lose its brilliancy.

Our latest invention, the Electric Drum Heater, entirely overcomes this difficulty, for by its use you can keep your drum brilliant and snappy regardless of the weather.

This device can be attached to any drum and the connecting plug will fit any ordinary 110-volt incandescent lamp socket. It gives no light; never burns out; may be turned on and off at will, or if desired, entirely removed in a few seconds time. Entire outfit, including the Heater proper, two connecting plugs, and six feet of cord, weighs eight ounces—the Heater but two. It is practically indestructible and can easily be carried in your drum case.

Be sure and say whether you wish it for Snare Drum, Bass Drum, or Tympani, as each instrument requires a different strength.

Try one—your money back if you are not entirely satisfied

TO THE EXHIBITOR

AT no period in our proposition have we lost sight of the significance of the Exhibitor's request for information. We have worked as rapidly as possible to effect exchange connections and at this hour we are formulating plans for territory with many prospective exchange men who have come to New York at our request. We are in fact ready for business and during the next thirty days you will probably be solicited for service by a Representative of the National Film Exchange for your territory. You have given us encouragement by your request for information, we are ready to serve you on a basis as remarkable as is the proposition of exclusiveness. We propose that the parent institution shall protect you in your contract for service; we propose that every National Exchange shall deliver what it contracts to deliver. We propose that every exhibitor shall understand that what he is entitled to receive to the end, that no man may with sincerity attack our program, which we pledge you shall be a program of merit and variety, served on a safe and sane basis. Do you wish to receive a copy of the National Idea.

Our program consists of the exclusive products of the following manufacturers:

Mono Film Co., Paris.

THE OPERATOR'S FRIEND

A Story of Facts

WE maintain when constructing a machine for a given purpose, it is absolutely important that attention be devoted to design as well as serviceable quality.

DID YOU EVER KNOW A REALLY FIRST-CLASS MECHANIC satisfied to operate a heavy, cumbersome and noise-racking machine, WHEN HE KNEW there was another machine for exactly the same purpose, so constructed as to combine equal service with Beauty of Design, Accessibility of Parts, Ease of Operation and Noiseless Running—AND PROJECTING THE MOST PERFECT PICTURE?

THE FIRST MOTIOGRAPH WAS A SUCCESS and is still a success, being in constant daily use, and giving as good a picture today as it did four years ago.

Every day the MOTIOGRAPH is replacing well-known machines of other makes, and we offer it ONLY ON ITS MERITS.

Andrew Carnegie said:

"Put all your eggs in one basket and then watch that basket."

That remark fits the motion picture business as if it were made for it especially. It's the business that you can put your money into and watch your investment grow right under your eye. Your outlay is less in proportion to your income than in any other business in the world.

But make your investment solid at the start by purchasing the right machine—

The Edison Kinetoscope

If you buy a cheap machine, sooner or later you have to throw it out and buy a good one. The Edison is the machine on which you can depend to outlast any other machine made. It projects the best and clearest pictures. No flicker, no long stops and waits that turn the crowd away and destroy your patronage. No wasting of your profit on repairs. The Edison is the machine that insures a constant, habitual patronage, continuous income and clear profits. It is the simplest machine to operate and all parts are readily accessible.

Write today for full particulars and copy of the Edison Kinetogram.

Jimmy Bass Says:

"The man who runs a moving picture theater and doesn't put in a Kimble Reversible A. C. fan, is missing the one best bet."

And Jimmy Bass knows, because he is Treasurer and General Manager of the Kimble Electric Company of Chicago. What's more, he's a hard-headed business man who means exactly what he says, and backs it up!

He also says:

"The man who runs a moving picture theater and operates his picture machine by hand, instead of hitching a

KIMBLE A. C. Motor

to it, is missing the best money-maker in the business."

I call him "Jimmy," and thousands of baseball "fans" used to shout themselves hoarse over "Jimmy," when he put bat twisters over the plate for old Northwestern "U," in the old days when Northwestern really played ball. But, I tell you, the short-lived joy of the college baseball fans wasn't a circumstance to the permanent, pleased satisfaction of the theater-man who ventilates his theater with "Jimmy's" Kimble Reversible, Variable Speed Alternating Current Fans. And the thrill of that moment in the ninth inning when Jim's sizzler retired three men on bases and won the pennant, is tame compared with the joy with which you will see one of Jim's motors handle your moving picture machine.

I'm taking advantage of Jim's absence on a business trip to talk this way, for he's a modest man and always was. And I'm putting cold facts into "play" language to suit the spirit of the vacation season.

Don't waste any time trying to find out who "I" am, but write to "Lest you forget"—

We say it yet:

Get a Power's No. 6

Power's No. 6 is the only moving picture machine which has been consistently designed to insure long service. The distinctive and characteristic feature of a moving picture machine is the device for producing the intermittent movement of the film. "Power's No. 6" is the only American moving picture machine that has an intermittent movement calculated to withstand hard wear; the only intermittent movement capable of long service at high speeds. It will stand more than four times as much hard service as the ordinary Geneva stop or star-wheel and cam movement.

The other parts of "Power's No. 6" have similar strength and durability. That's why we can guarantee it against wear—and why you can't afford to buy any other kind of machine.

Send for proposition G and let us put you in touch with dealers who will make it easy for you to put a "No. 6" in your theatre.

Mr. Insister Says: "The Pied Piper PIPED till the rats ran into the river, and I'll just INSIST till his reel runs into my place."

MR. INSISTER

RELEASED TUESDAY, AUGUST 1

From the Famous Legend

The Pied Piper of Hamelin

who has come down through the ages in song and story because of his wonderful achievement in driving the rats into the sea with his magical pipes, has been done into a film, as you see, and you should make a strong effort to show your patrons his deeds on the screen. Various versions of the Piper's achievements have been handed down, and the most pleasant of all is the one we have selected. We believe in light and sunshine in stories, and the particular reel is wisely surcharged with these elements.

A Study in Human Interest

THE JUDGE'S STORY

A stern judge from his bench one day casts a cold eye on a trembling negro on trial before him and—lapses off into a vivid dream. When he comes out of it, he relates it to the jury and—the prisoner at the bar is set free. But the proceeding was just what may have been expected, for the judge's tale, as the jury heard it, could only have brought the one result it did, and it is this remarkable story that we here picture for your enlightenment.

RELEASED JULY 24th 1911

A COUNTRY CUPID

The Romance of a Pretty Little Schoolmarm

Edith, the little school teacher, and her sweetheart, Jack, have a quarrel, and as she is beloved by all the scholars, they extend their sincere sympathy. Little Billy in particular is deeply grieved, and when she writes a letter to her sweetheart calling him back, but which her pride makes her ashamed to mail, Billy gets hold of the note and sees that it reaches the proper party. Jack hastens to Edith, and we find that Billy's act does more than effect a reconciliation, for it saves Edith from the terrible advances of a half-witted country boy, hitherto considered harmless, who also loved the little teacher, overstepping the boundary line of rationality in threatening death to both if she did not reciprocate his affection. The girl, however, knowing the half-wit's weakness for flowers, soothes him with a bouquet until Jack enters and releases her from her terrible ordeal.

THE LAST DROP OF WATER

A Story of the Great American Desert

This subject was suggested by the lines to Sir Philip Sydney, who, upon the field of blood, dying, gave the drop of water for the sake of brotherhood. Jim and John, long time friends, are the suitors for the hand of Mary. Jim is a chap of exemplary qualities, while John is a weakling and given to drink. Fate has it so that Mary accepts John. After their marriage they start off across the plains for more promising lands, Jim going along as one of the party. On the way over the Great Desert they are beset by hostile Indians. The fate of the party of tourists hangs in the balance for a long time, as they are enclosed in a stockade formed by wagons, repelling the Indians until the supply of water gives out and death from thirst seems inevitable. A call for volunteers to get water is made. Jim and John both go in its quest. Jim has given his last drop to a feeble old man as he leaves the stockade, while John, meeting Jim perishing with thirst on the desert, gives up to him the last drop between life and death. This draught renews the strength of Jim, who finally succeeds in finding water, while John drops in the sand, a victim of his sacrifice. Meanwhile, the troops have been notified and the party is rescued from the besieging redskins.

Facts and Comments

A PECULIARLY atrocious example of commercialism rampant is noted elsewhere in this issue of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD. An employee of a motion picture manufacturer accidentally lost his life in the performance of his duty and the manner of his death is recorded on the film, whereupon the enterprising (?) manufacturer hastens into the public prints to advertise the fact that his picture, during the taking of which the tragic event occurred, contains the "film actor's sensational fight for life" and admonishes exhibitors to "order now." Could anything be more ghoulish, more inhuman, than this? THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD hopes that exhibit will give evidence of possessing better taste and more humanity than this manufacturer seems to have by refusing to exhibit his picture. These strictures will apply with equal force to the newspaper that accepted the advertisement.

IT is reported that a little town in the South, where the veneer of our superfine civilization does not always stick as well as it might, has somewhat rudely refused the endownment of Andrew Carnegie for a library building. Why men of the type of Carnegie and Rockefeller so often expose themselves to having their checks returned with the unpleasant endorsement "Tainted" is more than we can understand. We would in all seriousness suggest to them and their kind to endow an educational film fund and know for a surety that their efforts toward enlightening mankind cannot fail of due appreciation. The educational film, not for schools alone, but in the widest sense of the word, is going to be an important factor in the spread of knowledge, as frequently pointed out in these columns. If a corps of competent lecturers with good educational films were to go through the principal cities of the country the national stock of useful and important knowledge would gain an immediate and substantial access. Better even for missionary work of this type would be the educationally neglected portions of our country, certain sections of the South for instance.

Such activity need not in the least interfere with the business of the exhibitors, but, we think, would on the whole benefit the exhibitor through the new and wider interest that would be created for the moving picture as such. Indeed the exhibitor and the specialist in most cases could work together. A man of great wealth, intending to benefit his kind, could likewise endow a plant for the production of educational films only, that would in public importance and usefulness soon rival the Smithsonian Institute and similar scientific centres. Take for example the science of ethnology; that is the study and science of the different races into which mankind is divided. It is well known that much remains to be cleared up in this branch of human knowledge, and the doubts and ignorance existing could in some measure at least be dispelled by competent camera experts in charge and under the direction of scientists of repute. The field of such a film-making enterprise would be the globe, from the lowest to the highest forms of life.

IN another part of this issue THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD has been at pains to throw out suggestions in respect to the proper treatment of the great feature films which are now being released. We know that some powerful theatrical interests are contemplating the possibilities in the right handling of these films, and we should not like to see old exhibitors unduly distanced. The fear of driving patrons away by a raising of the prices is, in the case of very fine attractions which consist of four and five reels, largely superstitious. No one is more justly entitled to the profits and emoluments that may be found in such films than the exhibitors, who have done so much for the popularizing of the better class of films.

ALTHOUGH many well-planned efforts to induce the New York Board of Education to make use of the motion picture to illustrate the public lectures given under its auspices have failed to move that body to action, THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD believes that the issue is still a live one, and will not be content until action is taken. Why, may we ask, should high-priced lecturers continue to illustrate their topics with slides that do not illustrate, when animated views of the subjects are to be obtained? Motion pictures have been made that will fit in to more than fifty per cent. of the topics used by the Board of Education lecturers; more would be forthcoming in the event that this modern method of illustration should be adopted by boards of education. Between the method now in vogue and motion pictures there is no comparison, for the latter is so far superior and so truly illustrative. Isn't it time that our educators woke up?

> When indictments for attempted murder are proved to be drawing-cards on the vaudeville stage, crime will be a fad. Perhaps moving pictures of the crime will be added to the indicted one's stunt.
> —New York World.

The suggestion is as unnecessary as it is gratuitous. For the motion picture to attempt to compete with the New York World or any of its "yellow" contemporaries in the depiction and description of the revolting details of crime would be at once unprofitable and impossible. No; it must remain for the newspaper to carry into the family all the nauseating particulars of human turpitude, variously expressed. Nor is any one exempt from the peculiarly enlightening influence thus exerted. Children of tender years are protected by boards of censors and legislative enactment from being corrupted by motion pictures. Upon that exquisite privilege of poisoning the mind of youth the New York World and its like have undisputed monopoly.

RECENT agitation among scenario writers is bringing out many of the woes and a few of the joys of the members of that branch of motion picture endeavor. THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD is pleased to give space to the discussion of subjects that interest the writers, not alone to encourage them, but to help them to correct some of the evils of which they complain. In this connection it will be interesting to writers of picture plays to know that

THE WORLD is now publishing a series of instructive articles from the pen of Epes Winthrop Sargent entitled "The Technique of the Photoplay." The same subject was treated briefly by Mr. Sargent in another publication, but in this series, which commenced in last week's WORLD, he will deal with scenario writing in a most exhaustive manner. As the author has had considerable experience, both as a writer of scenarios and as editor for one of the largest picture manufacturers, he is particularly fitted for the work he has undertaken. Scenario writers will profit by a careful perusal of his articles.

IN line with the foregoing comment come a few encouraging words from the Lowell Courier-Citizen, elicited by the Vitagraph's visualization of Julia Ward Howe's "The Battle Hymn of the Republic," shown at the Theatre Voyons. After seeing this historical motion picture allegory the Courier-Citizen writer observed:

> "At no point in the picture is the sentiment exaggerated. The mere fact of seeing this masterpiece of motion photography helps one to grasp the full significance of a work small in itself but which has profoundly influenced the course of our national development. On the whole, the film is a conservative and masterful production which well deserves the patronage of the citizens of this city."

That may be considered a fair average of the sort of editorial comment that will be forthcoming when picture theatre managers awake to the real wishes of their patrons respecting the character of pictures to be shown.

WITH all that is being said in public and trade press about the educational picture and the education of the public to a realization of the educational value of pictures, it would be interesting to note to what extent the educational idea is affecting the picture theatre manager. Now and then THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD hears from a manager who seems to be alive to his individual responsibilities in the matter of adapting himself to the betterment of theatre conditions, upon which so much of the uplift movement depends. But, in this season of "closing for repairs" how many are really preparing to raise the standard of their entertainment a few notches to conform with the demand for a better picture entertainment?

At one time and another THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD has recorded the efforts of manufacturers to raise the standard of the picture, and, it must be admitted, that the past year or so has seen wonderful progress along that line. Has the manager of the picture theatre kept pace? The opportunity offered by the "closed season" should not be spent in the application of new paint and the scrub brush alone. Let the manager tax his brains a bit in the renovation of his program also. Why not start the new season with a little more of the educational; there are plenty of scenic pictures to be had, and the number is increasing. We hear much complaint from exhibitors that there is too much of the "cowboy" brand, and that audiences are growing tired of that class of picture. If such is the case why not substitute the scenic, the topical and the educational? Several manufactures, both licensed and independent, are giving some attention to incidents in American history. We can imagine no subject that will be of greater iterest to patrons of the photoplay, or that will contribute more to the uplift, but we do not detect a wild clamor among exhibitors for that sort of picture. "Give us something that will make the people laugh" is the burden of their song.

Hence we are constrained to observe that the educational movement should be extended to embrace the theatre manager. He should study his audience closer and get an expression of preference from them that is indicative of more thought than is the "laugh" which goes with the comedy picture and which the average manager takes to be the last word of approval for pictures. Silent admiration may be and often is the mark of a more deep and lasting effect than the spontaneous laugh. That which excites our risibles is quickly forgotten, while that which stirs our intellect and starts in motion the machinery of thought produces a deep and lasting impression. Let the manager educate himself up to this higher standard while enjoying his summer vacation, and then open his house in the fall with a stronger appeal to the intellectual.

The Lost Gallery

Recent public prints have teemed with plans put forth by theatrical managers for regaining the patronage of the much feared but greatly appreciated "gallery god" who, it is averred, has been lured from his accustomed haunts in the top balcony of the legitimate theater by the insidious motion picture, much to the mental and financial annoyance of the aforesaid theater managers. So great, indeed, has been the falling off of the demand for the cheaper seats in the legitimate theaters that many attractions which might have been successful under other conditions, have failed signally through the desertion of the "gallery god." Hence, the cry of distress that has gone up from every American city where promoters of the legitimate drama have been accustomed to gather in the shining shekels in ever-increasing quantities in other years before pictures became the vogue.

Note of these conditions has been taken by the Frohmans, the Lieblers, Savage, Harris, the Shuberts and K. & E., who agree that the Lost Gallery must be regained and rehabilitated. Smacks of the storied efforts to recover the fabulous treasures of the "Lost Galleons of the Spanish Main." But, at this stage of the game, those plans are much in the way of locking the stable after the horse is stolen.

It has happened, at one time and another, in the history of human endeavor, that one thing of presumed indispensable utility, has been suddenly supplanted by some other thing of superior utility or convenience. Those persons interested in the supplanted thing have desperately resisted the inevitable only to capitulate in the end and adjust themselves to the newer conditions. Just now the legitimate theater interests are engaged in such a conflict, the end of which is in sight. Whether or not those interests are endowed with sufficient wisdom and foresight to terminate the conflict without material loss of pelf and prestige remains to be demonstrated.

It has been proposed by certain wise ones that the price of gallery seats be reduced. This is a half measure and will not have the desired result. The price of seats does not enter into the solution of the problem. There are a score of reasons for the loss complained of, any one of which is more potent than price considerations. One in particular may be mentioned, namely, the convenience of the picture show. To persons residing at any distance from the theater district of a large city the trouble occasioned in rushing home from business to dress for the theater outweighs the anticipated pleasure. Throw upon one side of the scales the nearby picture theater where one may with little physical exertion and small cost, pass the evening pleasantly and in comfort and you have the answer to the diminishing attendance at the legitimate house.

Another potent reason is the growing interest of and in the pictures themselves. Added to the merely amusing features of the average picture program, is the frequent educational subject illustrating some interesting feature of political or natural history, a mechanical process or scenes in unfamiliar lands, all of which possess deep interest to the observer and serve to entertain him in ever increasing numbers. Not alone is it the "gallery god" who has been enticed from the "legit"; men and women of refinement and discrimination will be found enjoying the mysteries and treasures of cinematography wherever suitable arrangements for their comfort are provided.

It might be imagined that men possessing the power of seeing things in advance—an attribute common to most theater managers—would have long ago discovered the practicability of co-operation with the established picture interests and thus held the allegiance of the "gallery god" by giving him the sort of entertainment his discriminating soul craved and at a price suited to his never too plethoric purse; also, that they, having the accommodations best calculated to serve the comfort of particular people would have been quick to see the importance of preserving the prestige of their houses as amusement centers.

It is never too late to mend and, to paraphrase the biblical allusion: While the lamp holds out to burn the most hide-bound legitimate theater manager may still get into the picture business with profit and honor.

Thus, and only thus, may the Lost Gallery be regained.

The Coming National Convention of Exhibitors

The National Convention of Moving Picture Exhibitors in this country is to be held on the first day of August. It promises to mark an epoch in the history of the moving picture industry. We presume that some plan for a permanent national organization will be adopted and that the convention will agree on a platform and a policy. To expect from this first great gathering of exhibitors a complete organization on a national basis, perfect in every detail, would be unreasonable. It is not likely that all of the States will be represented. The convention will do its full duty, if it succeeds in laying the cornerstone for a national organization by drafting such rules and regulations as will make it easy and desirable to every exhibitor to join.

That there may be formed at the coming convention in Cleveland the nucleus of a great, intelligent and powerful body, is the earnest hope of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD. So far, the exhibitor has had many duties, but no rights. He has had to bear, we think, a little more than his just proportion of the heat and burden of the day. Single-handed he had to fight all hostile legislation. Whenever he won, the victory benefited not only him but redounded to the advantage of the whole industry; whenever he lost, he had his labor for his pains. He had to meet his bills promptly in all kinds of weather and under all sorts of conditions, and he always had to pay one hundred cents on the dollar. He gets at first hand all the rude shocks and petty annoyances that daily contact with the public in such a democratic art temple as the moving picture theatre brings in its train. Waiting in the anterooms of film exchanges for his programme, often sitting on the steps, getting crumbs and enduring "the proud man's contumely," the exhibitor seemed indeed like the hewer of wood and the drawer of water in our great industry.

In spite of this strange situation, however, it was even in the earliest days of the industry generally recognized that the exhibitor, while weak and insignificant individually, was collectively important and powerful. It was soon felt that if the widely scattered exhibitors could be brought into one fold with a clear realization of the solidarity of their interests and that if the fold could find leaders of ability and experience, the exhibitor's power would be equal to that of any other in the industry. Efforts began to be made to organize on a State basis in different parts of the Union, and these efforts were on the whole attended with a considerable degree of success. These efforts are now expected to find final fruition in the creation and maintenance of a national body.

If the organizers keep to their task, and the spirit of organization among the exhibitors grows, there will come into being a new power in the field, which we have every reason to assume will be exerted for the benefit of the industry at large. In every industry, especially in this industry, so closely allied to art, it is well to have a division of power. We do not for one moment believe that in this strictly modern and complex industry of moving pictures there can be a wholly arbitrary and irresponsible power. There always is in the last analysis the responsibility to the public and to the trade conditions, neither of which can ever be controlled absolutely. It is, however, by no means impossible that the dominion of one interest over that of another may become too great, while the general welfare and prosperity of the industry demands a fair and just balancing of powers.

We therefore hail this new power, the nationally organized exhibitor, as a wholesome countercheck to any possible absolutism on the part of the manufacturers. To deal with problems arising out of their relations with the manufacturers an exhibitors' organization will best serve its ends by a society national in scope and territory, but it seems to us that in every other respect exhibitors should concentrate their efforts on the State organizations and keep them in the most active condition possible. The national organization must ultimately always derive its strength from a set of compact, strong and prosperous State bodies.

The exhibitors in acquiring the benefits of a national organization have one very substantial advantage to begin with: they have the good will of the only journal in the moving picture industry, to wit, THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD. This journal, as is well known, reaches every part of the United States; its activity is a national one in the fullest sense of the word: it brings together the East and the West, the North and the South. The national organization of exhibitors will find the columns of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD as hospitable and helpful as the State organizations have always found them in the past.

The time has come when the voice of the exhibitor must be heard and heeded in the councils of the industry.

Production Commercialized

Writing to the MOVING PICTURE WORLD, Mr. Milton A. Dodge, of Chicago, attempts to discuss what he fancies to be some of the crying needs of the picture business. Though the correspondent claims to have given this business considerable attention he seems to be singularly uninformed as to the commercial methods in vogue. There is one suggestion contained in his letter, printed in part herewith, regarding which we offer some comment—"A trade-marked product of uniform quality." Here is what Mr. Dodge says on that point:

For several years I have been engaged in solving advertising problems of greater or less extent. It is my method to approach an institution with open mind, with no preconceived conclusions, and, after a searching investigation of every detail of the business, analyze its needs. The moving picture business has occupied my attention for some time, and, as a result, I have reached certain conclusions. While some avenues of information have not been open to me, I believe that these conclusions will stand in the light of any other facts that might appear.

An unavoidable and important conclusion is that the production of films is a commercial manufacturing business, and should be treated as such. The word commercial is emphasized because, at the present time, the business seems to be regarded as a speculative one. That is, films are placed upon the market with a speculation as to whether or not they will win the fancy and approval of the theater operators and public. They are not produced with the certainty that they will be required to meet a maximum, fore-known demand.

To achieve the greatest success a manufacturing business requires three things:

1. A trade-marked product of uniform quality.
2. Satisfactory distributive machinery.
3. Progressive selling methods.

Let us discuss the first requirement. When you come to think of it, films are sold to the "ultimate consumer," Mr. Average Man, in five cent "packages." When he buys a package of Essanay, for instance, it must give him satisfaction. But, what is more important, he must learn that whenever he buys an Essanay package he can expect satisfaction. He will then come to demand the Essanay package. Now, the only way in which the Essanay, or any other producing company can bring such a state of affairs about is to produce a plainly labelled product of uniformly satisfactory quality. It may be argued that it is impossible to produce plays that will satisfy everybody. That is true. But it can not be denied that there is an attainable standard of quality which will always satisfy Mr. Average Man.

It is not the purpose of this article to embrace a discussion of ways and means of establishing an infallible standard of quality in plays. But it appears to an outsider, that the manufacturers are not giving enough attention to the choosing of scenarios. No matter how capable and conscientious a scenario editor may be, at his best he is only a fallible human being.

The MOVING PICTURE WORLD has always contended for the artistic in motion pictures as against that commercial instinct which would reduce the visualized drama to the level of box of biscuit or the latest best-seller in cigarettes. If the highest form of picture art is to be attained it can be accomplished only by the recognition of artistic excellence and the placing of that consideration foremost at all times. From the first the MOVING PICTURE WORLD has disparaged every movement of a commercial nature calculated to sustain mediocrity—to give the bad and the carelessly produced picture an equal chance with the good. In publishing the foregoing article by Milton A. Dodge our purpose is to show to what lengths the commercial idea may be extended and to emphasize the error of that policy.

We fear that we would insult Mr. Dodge's intelligence if we were to consider his proposition seriously. To do so would convict him of ignorance of the business which he attempts to advise; ignorance not only of existing trade organization, but of the predominating influence of the principles of pure art which of necessity must, and do, enter into the production of motion pictures. Hence, we say, without fear of contradiction, that any commercial device calculated to stamp with approval arbitrarily, or to guarantee a market for the product of any motion picture producer, regardless, is not calculated to improve motion pictures. Instead, it cannot fail to encourage the production of poor pictures, of which there are now too many.

There is little danger that Mr. Dodge's plan will ever come to pass. With motion pictures as with the legitimate drama, it is beyond the possibility of human endeavor to guarantee excellence or superiority. Even Frohman and Belasco have their failures, and will always continue to have them. If those wizards of the drama are not infallible, what guarantee have we that there shall come forth presently a race of motion picture producers who shall never know what it is to fail?

A Weekly Film of the World's Events

Beginning on the first day of next month the moving picture theatres of this country will go into active and, we believe, successful competition with the illustrated periodicals and magazines, for they will be able to show the important news of the world not in cold type or in still pictures but in actual moving reproduction. The exhibitors will give their patrons no descriptions or photographs, but the things themselves, "just as they moved and had their being." This novel idea, which will revolutionize pictorial journalism the world over, is called "The Weekly Journal," is edited by the Pathe Freres, and will appear on the screens of the moving picture houses every Tuesday. THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD was privileged to see an European edition of this marvelous picture sheet, and after seeing it we readily believed the statement of a Pathe representative to the effect that the demand in Europe for this film of the world's events far exceeds the demand for ordinary films, and that the exhibitors have gained a new and steady clientele. The reel opens with the title page, "The World's Events of Last Week," gives the name and address of the editor, with the telephone number, and then begins its "articles" with a regulation head-line or two. The first "page" showed a fine moving picture of the flower carnival at Nizza, with views of the aviation meeting held in connection with the festival; the second "page" transports us into Russia, where at St. Pettersburg we witness among the masses of snow the strange obsequies of a Corean prince, who had committed suicide there; the third "article" took us into Spain, where we had a fine view of King Alfonso laying a cornerstone, and afterwards assisting at some naval manœuvres; then followed a reproduction of the meeting of the Kings of Italy and Montenegro, a great event in Switzerland, showing the cleverness of the Swiss men on snowshoes; next a big fire in an English town, then the ravages of a furious storm on the Sicilian coast and other events of contemporaneous importance and interest.

The American edition will of course show more American events, but will give equally good pictures of the more sensational happenings in Europe.

How is it done? We answer: How does the newspaper gather its news from every quarter of the globe. Simply by organization. The reporter with the pen will be superseded by the reported with the camera. Camera correspondents will be on the alert in every part of the civilized world, regular correspondents and free lance correspondents, just the same as the members of the staff of a newspaper. The world will be treated to that rarest of rare things—a reporter who does not, in fact, who cannot lie. The events will come to us not as the policy of the paper would want to color them, but as they actually occurred. That is true reporting. The elder Bennet remarked years ago that the secret of success in journalism lay in being close to the place "where hell is going to break loose next." Nothing will escape the camera-man.

MUNICIPAL EXPLOSIVES COMMISSION.

Hearing on Revised Regulations.

Notice is hereby given to all persons interested that the Municipal Explosives Commission of The City of New York will give a public hearing on the 27th day of July, 1911, at 10.30 o'clock in the forenoon thereof, at Fire Headquarters, 157 East 67th Street, Borough of Manhattan, on the subject of the manufacture, transportation, storage and sale of motion picture films.

A copy of the proposed regulations may be obtained by applying in person to the Bureau of Combustibles, Fire Headquarters.

Dante's "L'Inferno"

It is the best type of the new and highest moving picture.

By W. Stephen Bush.

The reproduction in moving pictures of Dante's "Inferno" by the Milano Films Company well warrants the praise so generously bestowed upon it by the critics on the other side of the water. In my review of the comments of the Italian press I said in the Moving Picture World of July 8th:

> "We have implicit faith in the correctness of the Italian estimate of the artistic merits and powers of the film. The press agent in Italy is a distinct exotic, and could not thrive on the soil that has been hallowed by centuries of the life of noblest art."

This faith was not ill-placed.

I know of no higher commendation of the work than mention of the fact that the film-makers have been exceedingly faithful to the words of the poet. They have followed, in letter and in spirit, his conceptions. They have sat like docile scholars at the feet of the master, conscientiously and to the best of their ability obeying every suggestion of his genius, knowing no inspiration, except such as came from the fountain head. Great indeed has been their reward. They have made Dante intelligible to the masses. The immortal work, whose beauties until now were accessible only to a small band of scholars, has now after a sleep of more than six centuries become the property of mankind. Where shall we find a more eloquent testimonial to the "psychic force and value of the moving picture" and the incalculable benefits it brings in its train?

No man, woman or child has ever read and understood one line of Dante's but has derived from it some good, a drop at least, however small, of balm to the doubting heart. This ennobling influence of the great work will now tell upon millions. All that is commonplace, vulgar, low or base takes flight at the approach of Dante's spirit.

What the art of the printer failed to accomplish has been wonderfully wrought by the moving picture. Thanks to the moving picture, here at least the library as an educational and enlightening force must yield the palm to the theatre. To the artists, who have given us this visualization, we owe a debt of gratitude second only to that due to the great poet himself.

The eternal wonder of Dante's art is nowhere in the entire "Commedia" exterted with greater power than in the first canto of the Inferno. Its spell is immediate and irresistible. When I saw how completely the film-maker had caught the spirit of the canto, how he had indeed "risen to the height of that great argument," I realized that the same perfection would prevail throughout. The first canto offered difficulties that seemed insurmountable. How was it possible to convey in pictures all the subtle meaning of the printed words, to follow the dangers by which Dante was beset in the dark and gloomy forest, to show the "light panther," which barred the way and would not move; the lion, of which the "air itself was afraid"; the famished wolf, whose "hunger was greater after its maw was gorged with food"; how was the meeting between Dante and Virgil to be made probable and intelligible in pictures? Oh, men of little faith! It was all done with a power and skill that defies description and before the spectator realized it he was following from afar, but with intensest interest the Pagan and the Christian poet in their perilous wanderings through the "country around the valley," across the river Acheron into the presence of Minos, the dreaded judge, to the Stygean lake, into the "valley of the Abyss" and through all the pits and circles of the City of Dis and Malebolge, until the stars guide them out of the endless night of Cocytus into the blessed light of day.

It cannot be attempted within the prescribed limits of this hasty article to give even a condensed synopsis of the Inferno. I must be satisfied with the faint and brief outlines just drawn in the preceding words.

The fate of this great work now rests largely in the hands of the exhibitors themselves. There is no limit to the possibilities of the film as an artistic and theatrical attraction. There is no show-house anywhere in the world, no matter how high its standing, which could not gain renewed prestige through a proper presentation of this work upon its stage. It simply depends on the "proper" presentation. Rushed through the machine at lightning speed, with the idea of getting as many "shows" out of it as possible, without careful rehearsal, without music and without lecture, the work is sure to be degraded into a horrible farce. A disposition to look upon the film as merely a classic chamber of horrors and to treat it as such in the advertising or lecturing would be an error scarcely less fatal to the success of the work than the first. The financial profits of this enterprise are not to be gathered by "crowding them in" as fast as possible and then "chasing them out" again, but by a substantial advance in the prices. The hackneyed objection that the public will not spend money on a "moving picture" and is unable to dissociate the picture from the small currency of the Republic is not well taken. In the first place travelogues with moving pictures have brought good prices, but that is the minor reason. The better answer to the objection is that Dante's Inferno is indeed a "different kind of moving picture." The attempt to get substantial prices need only be made to be successful. The high prices, however, must be followed by a corresponding artistic standard. It is the duty of the exhibitor by proper advertising to let the public know of the higher standard and then live up to that standard in the performance with scrupulous honesty. Lithographs are good and useful, but there is such a thing as a lithographic debauch, and with the variety of posters at the exhibitor's disposal it is well to avoid the loud and the purely sensational, else the public will be justified in believing it's "just a picture show." Let the difference between the ordinary picture and such genuine works of art in four and five reels be emphasized in every particular.

A comparison is invited by certain apparent points of similarity between the Passion Play and the Inferno. The points of resemblance are only apparent. The Passion Play was subject to a weakness from which the Inferno is entirely free. Many of the most intelligent and cultured classes were repelled rather than attracted by the Passion Play because a visualization of the gospel story seemed to them to smack of irreverence. We may disagree with them, but their tastes and beliefs in such a matter are important to the man who wishes to attract the most and the best of the people. No one can urge any such objection against the Inferno. If the exhibitor will try, he should have no trouble in enlisting on his side two important factors: first the Dante scholars, who in almost every city are organized in Dante Societies (there are very strong and numerous Dante societies in New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, St. Louis). Few cities in the United States are without such a society. The Milano production is so excellent that it will arouse the enthusiasm of such scholars, and while they themselves may be small in numbers their influence with the public in a matter of this kind would be very great and their approval and commendation of the film valuable in proportion.

As a rule these Dante scholars are men of prominence in their communities, men identified with public life or with educational institutions. With the aid of a private and special exhibition to such men, the daily press will be forced into serious recognition of the moving picture, and will send critics of ability to treat the matter, instead of giving the attraction a few lines of the press-agent variety of criticism for the sake of the advertising space bought by the exhibitor. Such serious recognition would mean much and would at once impress the public and make them understand that a new and higher type of moving picture has come and that higher prices are a very natural consequence.

Second on the list of Dante friends and admirers are the Christian, more especially the Roman Catholic clergymen. Dante is today revered as an orthodox Catholic, and his poem is indeed based strictly on the orthodox Catholic philosophy. If here and there in the poem he is seemingly severe on the papacy, it must be borne in mind that in Dante's time free criticism of the Pope was permitted and that the popes entering political life as they then did laid themselves open to the anger and enmity of their political enemies, of whom Dante, however orthodox in matters of faith, was not the least bitter.

The greatest aid to the proper presentation must, however, be the complete explanatory lecture. Every audience will feel the need of it before the first reel is well under way. If this feature of the production is treated intelligently its success is bound to be complete. It will, however, tax a good speaker and a competent Dante scholar to the uttermost to keep pace with the high artistic standard set by the film-maker. Nothing less than the best will do.

CRITERION THEATER, POPLAR BLUFF, MO.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

George Kleine announces that his big feature, "A Society Mother," which he has been advertising for some weeks for release on July 25th, has been delayed in shipment from Paris and cannot be released until July 29th. The reel which he has decided to release in its place is "A Favoring Current," 680 feet; "St. Malo and the English Channel," three hundred and ten feet.

HERBERT BLACHE SAILS FOR EUROPE.

Mr. Herbert Blache, president of the Gaumont Co., of New York, accompanied by his wife, Mrs. Alice Blache, president of the Solax Co., will sail on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie, July 26th for a two months' trip through European countries, for a combined business and pleasure trip. They look forward to meeting their many friends in all the big European cities, where they are both well known.

Reviews of Notable Films

"THE RANCHMAN'S NERVE."

A Western Drama by the American Without a "Tenderfoot." Reviewed by Jas. S. McQuade.

"The Ranchman's Nerve" is the title of an exciting Western drama, by the American Film Manufacturing Company, that will be released July 19. The story is of the elemental type and deals with the desperate acts of a "bad man" and the nerve of a rancher who has been deputized to bring him in from his mountain fastness.

The scenes are laid out of doors in the Far West, and they afford glimpses of wild and rugged grandeur, the photography being good throughout, with the exception of one spot, where the panoramic swing of the camera has been marked by a blurring of the picture. Skill and care in the printing will be apparent to the critical eye.

One must compliment the producer on having selected representative Western types for the characters in this simple drama. There is not a "tenderfoot" among them. They are a hardy, rugged lot, but we are somewhat disappointed in their bravery. To see a crowd of big, brawny Westerners —the members of a posse gathered for the purpose of apprehending a daring outlaw—refusing to follow their officer, and permitting him to go alone into the jaws of death, is not just what we have been led to believe, and know, of Western nerve and courage.

Silent dramas of "The Ranchman's Nerve" type will always have a large following among picture goers, for whom the story of the film must be clearly told from the outset; and they will always have a fascination for those who love the thrills of a "man chase." One thing is certain: "The Ranchman's Nerve will hold attention tensely, up to the final moment, when the outlaw is shot.

Warren Kerrigan, as the ranchman, and Jack Richardson, as the outlaw, are worthy of praise for their virile impersonations. The outlaw is Fred Peters, a young man who lives in a shack in the mountains, with his mother and sister. He has paid no heed to his mother's entreaties that he should give up his idle life and work as a man should. Accustomed to shoot game and other wild animals from boyhood, he has become a marksman of unerring skill. This fact has aided in making him a daring highwayman.

STIRRING SCENE FROM "THE RANCHMAN'S NERVE" (AMERICAN).

In the opening scene we see him take his rifle, despite the pleadings of his mother and sister, and disappear through a defile in the mountains. Soon we again catch sight of him. He slides down a precipitous ledge of rock to the roadway beneath, where he waits and listens expectantly. In the distance we see a horseman approaching at a gallop. Peters crouches in the background. As the express rider arrives at the spot, the outlaw covers him with a revolver and halts him. Then relieving him of his pouch and gun, the robber commands him to be off.

The express rider at once seeks the sheriff. A posse is raised and we see them gallop furiously to the scene of the hold-up. From his place of hiding the outlaw sees them, and takes careful aim with his rifle. There is a quick dismounting of the posse and we notice that the sheriff has been shot in the right forearm. He asks his men to scale the rocks and capture Peters, but they refuse. Then, conscious of his helplessness, the sheriff mounts his horse and gallops homewards, followed by his cowardly men.

Next we witness a consultation between the sheriff and the express rider. The latter, knowing that a man of nerve must be found to lead another posse, determines to find him. We see him approach a body of men near a wayside inn and, in bravado fashion, challenge any one of them to fight with bowie knives, he holding the corner of a handkerchief between his teeth and offering a choice of the weapons to the man who accepts, the latter to take the opposite corner of the handkerchief in his teeth, after which the fight will begin.

Not a man of the lot has the sand to accept the challenge. Then Bob Steele, a young ranchman, rides up and, learning from a bystander the cause of the excitement, he approaches the express rider and seizing a knife and gripping the handkerchief he makes a savage attack on his opponent. The latter immediately drops his corner of the handkerchief and explains to Steele anl the other men the reason for his bullying tactics. The ranchman is immediately made a deputy by the sheriff, a posse is collected and we see them dash off to the hiding place of the outlaw.

Again the rifle of the latter speaks and one of the posse tumbles from his horse. The ranchman dismounts and orders his men to follow him. They refuse. Angered by their cowardice he throws away his revolver, and announces that he will bring in the outlaw single-handed and unarmed. Then he climbs up the rocks and disappears.

The outlaw believing that he has again dispersed the posse, hides his rifle under a rock and heads for home. The ranchman catches sight of him and stealthily tracks him to the hut in the mountains.

The mother and sister of the fugitive discover that he has committed robbery and, as the girl is despairing of the future, the ranchman approaches. Mother and son are within doors. The deputy inquires about the man he has been tracking. The girl attempts to turn him in another direction and, while they are talking, the outlaw rushes out and covers the deputy with his revolver. The girl places herself in front of the officer, but he puts her aside gently and confronts his adversary. Unnerved by this courage and, doubtless, unwilling to commit murder in the presence of his mother and sister, the outlaw loses his alertness. With a quick movement the ranchman disarms him.

Moved by the distress of the mother and sister the ranchman gives the outlaw "one hour to get across the line." After his departure the ranchman discovers that his is a case of love at first sight. He avows his love for the girl and finds that it is returned. Then he leaves for home, refusing to take the revolver, although pressed to do so by his sweetheart, who knows the treacherous nature of her brother.

Fearing evil will befall her lover, the girl, unknown to him, follows. At a wild spot in the mountains the ranchman stops to take a drink from a spring. A shot rings out and grazes his scalp. It is quickly followed by another, and we see the outlaw's body slide down a rock into a ravine. He had secured the rifle hidden earlier in the day and had lain in wait for the ranchman. His bullet had missed its mark, but that from the revolver aimed by his sister found his brain.

THE LEGEND OF LAKE DESOLATION (Pathe).

The Indian, howling and scalping, killing and burning, is to a normal human mind a horrible and repulsive sight. We have had quite enough of him in moving pictures and it is one of the pleasing symptoms of the "higher ideals," that they begin to shine out even in Indian films. The Selig and Essanay companies have done much to give us a picture of the Indian more in accordance with history and in some of the Pathe American films there has recently been a similar tendency. In the present film this laudable effort to give us a true picture and not a caricature of the redman has been particularly successful. Only a few days ago a full-blooded, but highly educated Indian has enriched our literature with a fine book, "The Soul of the Indian," showing that the red race was intensely spiritual and had a child-like, but sublime conception of God and of man's duty to man.

Glimpses of this rude faith are apparent in this present film and stamp it with a beauty all its own. A golden haired little white girl is found by an Indian and taken to the Indian tents, where she is reared in the ways and traditions of the red race. In the course of the years she grows into a sweet and winsome lass and becomes the idol of the tribe, which has adopted her. When she has reached early womanhood she is recognized by her brother and is induced to leave the people by whom she was so deeply beloved. The legend says, that the light went out of the hearts of the red people when their idol departed and even nature showed her sorrow by suddenly changing from the vernal charms of spring into the barrenness and desolation of winter. Nothing shows more clearly the genuine Indian origin of the legend than this feature, for to the simple children of nature nothing seemed more tragic than the sudden coming of the winter, which to every Indian tribe meant suffering and privation. Another touching part of the legend is the fate of the old chief, who was particularly attached to the white girl. He tells his people that he must go to "prepare a way for them," and when in deep reverence they turn their backs he strikes a fire in the canoe and without paddle lets it drift upon the water until he and the frail bark of birch are consumed by fire. The facts of the legend might perhaps have been developed more simply and directly, but as the scenes and episodes delaying the mysterious denouement are always welcome to the spectator this diffuseness will easily be forgiven. The last scenes in the reel are weird, beautiful and wholly original—words of praise that cannot be conscientiously bestowed on many Indian films.

LEVY LEASES SEATTLE'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE.

Eugene Levy, motion picture magnate, of Seattle, Wash., has extended his operations by acquiring the lease of the Grand Opera House, of that city. Levy now owns five theaters in Seattle, and some in Tacoma and Portland. He is the originator of a number of bright ideas in connection with picture theater management, the latest of which is a system of checking babies while you see the show—a lovely thing for tired mothers.

"THE PROFLIGATE."

A Tragic Subject Laid in the Days of Napoleon. Reviewed by Jas. S. McQuade.

I enjoyed very much a private exhibition of "The Profligate" at the Selig plant the other day. This film was produced by the Selig Western company, under the supervision of Francis Boggs, and is distinguished by finished acting, photographic effects of rare softness, and backgrounds of artistic beauty.

The story, which introduces us to French characters, who played their parts in the time of the great Napoleon, is of the romantic type, and the plot is well connected and clearly developed in the pictures. The costumes of the period have been carefully reproduced and the prominent characters have been sustained with a nice appreciation of French politeness and mannerisms.

Hobart Bosworth, in the title role, proves a dashing young captain of hussars, whose rich uniforms, distinguished bearing and good looks create havoc among women's hearts. The sword contest in the final scene, in which the faithless captain receives his death wound from the woman he has wronged, is spirited and realistic. Miss Eugenie Besserer, who takes the part of the wronged wife, sustains the character with fine force throughout. The old fencing master is another strong impersonation, for which Frederick Huntley merits creditable mention, while Miss Betty Harte is to be complimented for admirable work in the role of Mercedes.

Notable scenes in the film are those showing the fete, the operation of a field battery during the war and the lake scene, where Mercedes in a demented condition attempts self destruction. The interior of the hospital, showing the care of the wounded brought from the front, also deserves more than passing notice.

The opening scene shows Pauline, the eldest daughter of Monsieur Revere, taking a fencing lesson, the master betraying by his manner more than an ordinary interest in her progress. Later we see him propose to his skillful pupil, and note the manful deference shown her when she tells him that while he has her friendship he can never claim her love.

Then the fete approaches, where Pauline meets Captain DuBois and is at once infatuated by his address and appearance. They are bethrothed. Shortly afterwards war breaks out and the captain is ordered to the front. Before departing he secretly marries Pauline.

Mercedes, the sister of Pauline, offers her services as a hospital nurse at the opening of hostilities. Her duties call her to a distant city. Captain Du Bois is seriously wounded in one of the opening engagements of the war and is carried to the hospital in which Mercedes works. He is assigned to her care and she learns to love the handsome soldier. She is ignorant of the secret marriage of her sister and he is equally ignorant of her relationship to Pauline, having never met her before.

During the convalescence Du Bois discovers that his pretty nurse is interested in him and makes love to her. With guileless heart she believes in his honor and they are married.

Shortly afterwards Mercedes, happy in her wedded life, invites her father and Pauline to visit her. Accompanied by the fencing master they arrive at the hospital, and are conducted to the home in which Mercedes has been living so happily. The sisters are happily engaged in conversation when the husband of Mercedes enters. To Pauline's horror she discovers that he is none other than Captain Du Bois, to whom she had been lawfully married a few months before. The profligate captain immediately recognizes Pauline and hastily leaves the room, while she endeavors to conceal her agitation and the truth from Mercedes.

Tragic Scene from "The Profligate" (Selig).

We then see the false captain hand a letter to a boy, with instructions, and gallop furiously away. The letter is delivered to Pauline and she reads it in the presence of her sister, her father and the fencing master also being present. Her husband requests her to tell the truth to Mercedes and attempts to excuse his conduct by stating that he did not know that Mercedes was her sister. The closing words conveyed the news that he had gone out of their lives forever.

The letter drops to the floor from Pauline's nerveless hand and is immediately picked up and read by Mercedes. For a moment she stands motionless and then falls unconscious to the floor. When she is revived, it is found that reason has fled.

And now Pauline has only one object in life; it is to avenge her sister. She tells her old friend, the fencing master, that he must teach her all he knows of his art, and he gladly consents. After months of preparation Pauline decides that she is ready for the encounter.

Disguising herself as a lieutenant of hussars and wearing a mask, she seeks out the betrayer of her sister. She is accompanied by the fencing master. Captain Du Bois is discovered one day in a cafe and Pauline provokes a quarrel. Swords are immediately drawn and, after a display of skill by both contestants, Captain Du Bois receives a death wound. With his remaining strength he snatches the mask from the face of his opponent and discovers his wife. Then he falls dead.

THE LAST DROP OF WATER (Biograph).

"The good men do," is not always "interred with their bones," but on the contrary nothing abides more lastingly in the recollection of the children of men than the memory of a noble deed, witness the inspiration of this splendid Biograph film. Centuries ago, a noble Englishman lay stricken and wounded on a field of battle. Prostrated by the heat and struggle he pressed a cup of water to his lips, when he heard the moan of a dying common soldier close by. Sir Philip Sydney turned to the soldier and gave the precious water to him with these Christ-like words: "Brother, thy necessity is greater than mine."

The present picture shows us a display of heroism and unselfishness in the days when the pioneers were journeying toward the Golden West. In a little village in what we now call the Middle West a young girl rejects her manly suitor and following her fancy, marries a good-natured, but rough and weak fellow, given to drink. Shortly after her marriage to John, Mary and her husband with many neighbors decide to strike the trail for the Far West, and among the band of immigrants is Jim, the defeated rival, who has become reconciled to the situation, but who always keeps a loving and watchful eye upon Mary. John, the husband, meanwhile has yielded more and more to the vice of drunkenness, though for the sake of the young wife he makes feeble efforts to reform. As the canvas-covered caravan is moving through the great American desert, it is threatened and attacked by Indians. The immigrants succeed in warding off the Indian attack, but a new and more horrible danger is now upon them—lack of water. Both John and Jim start out to get water for the suffering camp. Each is provided with a number of empty canteens and a small amount of water for his own use during the perilous search. John is seen creeping and walking and sitting down to rest. He is getting ready to drink the water in his canteen, when he feels the touch of a hand upon his knee. It is the hand of Jim, who quite spent, has fallen down beside him, half unconscious. The situation is tense. The water on hand is not sufficient for both men, for Jim has drunk his. John has halted the hand on its way to the parched lips. The workings of his face show that a great inward struggle is going on. Does he think of his weakness, which he has been unable to conquer? Does he fear it will end in shame for himself and misery for his young wife? If one of them must die or brave the danger of death, is it not better to have the man survive whose features show no trace of the fatal vice? John gives the water to his old rival, who quickly revives and soon finds a tiny pool of water, more than enough to save the camp. John succumbs to the heat and thirst. Jim returns to the camp with the water, and but a few minutes afterward the soldiers from a neighboring fort drive away the Indians with great slaughter.

Such in brief is the story. As has been seen it carries a deep moral, "that there is some good in the worst of us." Its dramatic power is too apparent to need particular mention. What lends an extraordinary interest to the picture and gives it no little educational value is the fact that the pictures were actually taken in the American desert. At the sight of the barren solitudes and sandy wastes with their utter desolation a feeling of fear steals into the heart. We see everywhere the cactus with its straight, sharp thorns, fit growth upon such inhospitable soil, nor are there wanting the skeletons of animals and the bones of men, bleaching upon the endless plains of alkali.

All the beauties of the picture cannot be crowded into the small compass of this article, but some allusion must be made to the scenes inside the threatened camp of the pioneers, the attack of the Indians, the rush of the cavalry from the fort, the long trail of wagons across the wastes and the forming of the stockade at the approach of Indian danger. To Americans pioneer stories must always be welcome, for not only have these humble heroes opened up a new and wonderful land, but they have transmitted to later and present generations the endurance and contempt of danger, which are to this day a heritage of the American character.

Utica, N. Y. Arrangements have been filed with the Building Inspector by L. H. Chapman, president of the L. H. Chapman Toy and Novelty Company, for the building of an elaborate and commodious moving picture theater, to seat about 440. It will be modern and up-to-date in every respect, having a large and airy operating room. No money had been spared in making this one of the most beautiful fireproof picture theaters in this vicinity. The new enterprise will open its doors about August 1.

On a Tramp Steamer

A Vitagraph Portrayal Strong in Action.

There is much that is interesting and much more that is ordinary in life and we accept them as matters of fact. We hanker for the unusual something with force and power in it that stirs our red blood and makes us feel the necessity of doing things. This picture possesses all of these qualities and points out man's ingratitude to man, showing how a fellow in distress is helped by a friend and repays him with the most perfidious and base thanklessness that it is within the power of human meanness to invent.

Jim, the hero of this portrayal, is the antithesis of Joe, the villain. Jim's generous and philanthropic spirit is not easily quenched, but only serves to arouse the instinctive yellow streak in Joe, who tries to make trouble between his benefactor and his sweetheart, Meg. Joe's ignominy comes to a climax on a tramp steamer where Jim secures a position for Joe as his assistant stoker. A disparaging remark starts a fight between the two, and a duel with shovels ensues, until Jim silences his antagonist with a blow. While the struggle is going on the ship strikes a rock, water is fast pouring into the hole and flooding the boiler room until it threatens to drown the two men, now waist deep in swirling water.

Duel with Shovels in the Fire Room.

Jim, with the generous impulse of his nature, carries his unconscious foe to the deck, where he places him in a life boat with the rest of the crew. The boat is swept away from the wrecked steamer, leaving Jim on board to escape as best he can.

Joe and the crew are picked up by a passing vessel and in the course of time he finds himself back in the home where he first met Meg, and tells her that Jim perished on the ill-fated seamer. But Jim, after drifting about on a raft in mid-ocean, was picked up by a passing craft, arrives home just in time to foil the villain in his treachery.

All the situations described in this animated portrayal are vividly depicted in every scene and is altogether a satisfactory fulfillment of the triumph of right over wrong, forcibly emphasized in its happy ending. As an example of what the picture maker can accomplish in the way of realistic effects, this subject challenges admiration. It is not the privilege of everyone to descend to the stoke-hole of a steamship; those who will quickly recognize the place by the representation, so real is it.

"She Came; She Saw; She Conquered."

A Happy Vitagraph Portrayal of School Days.

This picture takes us back to our school days and we live them over again. It puts us in sympathy and in touch with the young, and brings us into associations that keep us young. Mark Twain's "Huckleberry Finn" and "Tom Sawyer" never did funnier things, and there is much in this picture that reminds us of just such boys, their laughable pranks, and irrepressible spirits bubble in every scene. We step right into the old "deestrict" school and take our places at the jack-knifed, initialed desks frought with the fond recollections which are brought to our view.

Three male teachers have been unable to subdue the scholars in their disposition to run the school to suit themselves, and it seems as if they were in high mutiny when Miss Rose Leigh, a charming young lady, comes to take charge and accomplish what her masculine predecessors had failed to do. Of course, she has her own trials and tribulations before she is successful. She has to bring the boys to terms by kindness and firmness even to the suppressing of their conspiracy to lick one of the boys whom she has taken particular pains to assist in his studies. She gains their respect, shows them that she is an equal match for them and they all fall in love with her.

The beauty of this portrayal is that everything and everybody is real, all the boys are perfectly natural and show it by popping Si Perkins and Hiram Green, the school trustees, with spit balls and beans, when they come to visit the school to compliment the teacher and the scholars for their proficiency. She has conquered the school and is looked upon as a fixture very much to the satisfaction of the trustees, pupils and parents. They are congratulating themselves on their good fortune, not looking for a surprise that is sprung upon all hands by the appearance of a young man whom the teacher introduces as her fiance, at the same time handing in her resignation, to take a position in the school of matrimony.

It is some time before the people of the district can recover from their astonishment, but with good grace they express their regrets and show their appreciation, with many gifts and a rousing "three cheers," when Rose and her intended husband leave on the departing train.

Chicago Letter

By Jas. S. McQuade.

There is much raving in certain quarters at the present time, over the censoring of films, as if that subject had not long since been threshed out and an opinion formed as to what, in this respect, is best for the future of the picture industry.

There is no doubt that pictures are frequently subjected to indignities that other forms of entertainment escape, and that many good-minded people often worry the exhibitor without just reason. But is not such surveillance usually on the safe side? Is it not a convincing proof of the tremendous and tenacious hold which the picture has taken on the minds of the millions of plain people, who have learned to look on the picture theater as specially their own? Is there any other form of entertainment so regularly patronized by children and the youth of the country? And can too much care be bestowed on seeing that such entertainment will assist in making the future guardians of our country good men and women?

The picture has come to stay, and, as it enters so largely into the lives of young people, as well as "grown-ups," it must measure up to the standard of good morals prevailing among the majority. The subjects must be worthy. There must, and can be, no place for the unworthy.

The stimulus given the picture industry by the National Board of Censors, of New York, and by the Chicago Board of Censors cannot be overestimated. Every manufacturer of films who has the future welfare of the moving picture at heart, will readily concede that film censorship—as performed by the two agencies mentioned—has accomplished great good, both in a moral and financial sense. Such censorship has popularized the picture, and increased the demand for a larger output, and the more carefully it is performed the less need there will be for local censorship boards. Indeed the latter will find, as many of them have already found, that the work they had planned to do has already been well done for them.

Exhibitors, the intelligent and wise ones, have been working patiently and persistently to build up the best patronage possible. They know every patron and are on good terms with all. Their patrons trust them and know that the picture subjects furnished them will be clean and acceptable to every member of the family. Ask these exhibitors if film censorship is not a good thing. They will tell you that right censorship is the very heart blood of their business, for it is a guarantee that their patrons will not be offended at any time.

The picture, in places, is being blamed instead of the forbidding surroundings amid which it is exhibited. Is it possible that there are still dark theaters, when it is now so easy to light them and project the pictures fully as well! These dark, small, badly ventilated and ill-managed theaters have menaced the moving picture from the outset. They should be closed.

Give us right censorship of pictures and fitting homes in which to introduce them.

Michigan Exhibitors Convene at Detroit.

The first annual convention of the moving picture exhibitors of the State of Michigan was held in Detroit, from July 11 to 13, inclusive. About 100 visiting exhibitors were present, of whom the licensed and indepenlent interests were nearly equally represented.

The headquarters of the visitors were in the Burns Hotel, and the convention was held in Turner Hall, 136 Sherman Street. The proceedings were private, the only disclosures made being the election of officers for the State organization and of delegates to the national convention at Cleveland, August 1.

The officers of the State association are: Peter J. Jeup, owner of the licensed theaters Pastime and American in Detroit, president; H. F. Towser, owner of the independent theater Vaudette, Lansing, Mich., vice-president; William Lester Levy, of the Lester Theater, Detroit, secretary, and Carl Ray, owner of two theaters in Muskegon, Mich., treasurer.

The delegates chosen for the Cleveland convention are: William Lester Levy of Detroit; J. J. Reeder, Jackson, Mich., and B. L. Converse, of Owasso, Mich.

The convention of State exhibitors was called by the Detroit Moving Picture Association, through Secretary F. H. Baumgartner, of the Dreamland Theater, Detroit, who sent out a letter to nearly every exhibitor in the State. Following are extracts from the communication:

"The purpose of the convention is to bring together men in the moving picture field who are interested in their business and have an eye on the future.

"We are at present subjected to the demands made by the many growing arms of the moving picture manufacturers. You are paying for things that you never paid for before, and you are paying more for things than ever before. It is only through organization that any good can be accomplished, for when organization meets organization, arbitration is better than trouble. As we are now, we have no chance whatever.

"Among the many things to be taken up will be the mutual protection and preservation of the moving picture exhibitors of the State of Michigan, which will be further enhanced by a possible affiliation with other States that are already organized.

"The exhibitors of Detroit realize that scattered somewhere through Michigan are minds that are brighter by far than many of those in their own city. Minds that are keen of conception, and that have the ability to grasp opportunities. Minds that can plan and execute. It is to these men in particular that the invitation is extended, for the less able brother won't feel slighted, should he be guided by able hands and willing hearts.

"The committee of arrangements of the Detroit Moving Picture Exhibitors Association has worked hard and faithfully to make the convention a success, so far as entertainment is concerned, and they promise all who attend a happy time. You will be glad you came, Mr. Exhibitor, and your regret will be that we haven't organized before."

The following manufacturers, or representatives of manufacturers, were present: David Horsley, of the Nestor; Mark Dintenfass, of the Champion; A. M. Kennedy, of the American, and I. Bernstein, of the Yankee. John Hardin, Western representative of Thomas A. Edison, Inc., and Mr. Clark, of the Enterprise Optical Company, were also in the city.

The Detroit Association entertained the visiting exhibitors royally. On Tuesday, July 11, there was an auto drive to Belle Isle, where dinner awaited the party. I. Bernstein, of the Yankee, was present at this gathering and contributed to the joyousness of the occasion by making the sparkling bubbles flow.

Before adjournment it was announced that the convention will be held next year, on the same dates, at Muskegon, Mich.

The Magnet Airdome a Success.

J. M. Bradlet is making a big success with his airdome at Park Ridge, Ill. The Herald of that town had the following paragraph in a recent issue:

"The picture shows at the Magnet Airdome have been drawing great crowds throughout the week, but the shows well deserve large audiences. J. M. Bradlet, the proprietor, has taken great pains and precaution for the comfort and safety of his patrons, and the place, since it has changed hands, has been entirely gone over. The films are better than those shown under the prior management and the present management is generally as clean and businesslike as one could expect to find. Shows are given every evening except Sunday and in another column of this issue will be found an advertisement showing the program as to subjects and evenings on which they are given."

Some Chicago Picture Shows.

By C. Young.

Drake Theater, at Milwaukee and Drake Avenues, is a handsome example of the modern type of moving picture theater which is going up all over the city. It is owned by Hyman Brothers, Hirsch and Linder. Although it has been open but two weeks, it has already built up such a trade that it can hold out the people on a hot night, after a matinee in the afternoon. One of the factors in the success of this theater is, of course, good projection. The Standard moving picture machine is used, and the picture is thrown upon a Sunlight metallic cloth curtain. Although the side lights are by no means of low candle power, and are not what could be called well shaded, the picture on this screen is brilliant, soft, with much detail and depth, without the shadows which are present in most other metallic-faced screens. Music is furnished by what Manager Harry Lindner humorously calls a "Hungarian band," consisting of Arthur Wilhelm, pianist, and Harry Renson, drummer. They play to the pictures well, and Mr. Renson is another drummer who uses brains instead of muscle on his drums and effects, though he did use the latter, properly, while an Ambrosio Tweedledum comedy was shown. The films used in this theater are independent, supplied by the Laemmle Film Service.

Just a few doors east of the Drake Theater is the Avondale Theater, another pretty house, showing licensed pictures very well. The throw is very long, and a rather long focus lens is required, while the baseboard of the machine is of the right length to suit a lens of half the focal length—result, a ghost in the picture, which cannot be eliminated, though Operator Alfred H. Fales has succeeded in doing away with part of it by the use of very long focus condensers. The Motiograph machine is used, and the picture on the screen, aside from the slight ghost, is of very good quality. Manager Mars had a good show on the evening I called there, and the audience was kept in good humor by the Biograph Company's "Delayed Proposal."

I dropped into the Premier Theater on State Street near Van Buren, and found that, although it is a ten cent vaudeville house, the projection is far superior to that of the average straight picture show in the loop. The Pathe Coronation film was being shown, and was run very well, being given full time, while the operator maintained his light as he should, not allowing ghosts or yellow corners to appear.

Lyric Theater, at State and Van Buren Streets, another of the chain of Jones, Linick and Schaefer theaters, has recently been reopened, after closing down a short time to remodel. Two upper floors of the building have been removed to make room for a balcony, which seats about 150 people, making the total seating capacity of the house nearly 500. The operating room has been placed at the top of this balcony, causing a drop in the throw of something like 40 feet, but the picture scarcely shows it. The mirror screen is still in place here, and gives a very fine picture. Under the balcony three indirect lighting fixtures have been installed, lighting up the theater comfortably, while the balcony itself effectively protects the screen from the light. If the management of this theater would pay as much attention to the music as is done at the Orpheum, it will be but a short time until the Lyric is as popular a theater as the Orpheum. I saw Pathe's "Waiting" here, and the pianist simply made the picture talk, but when the drummer started to hammer out noise for the next picture, the effect was utterly destroyed. It will be noticed that the drummer at the Orpheum rarely has any occasion to make any amount of noise, but the average drummer never seems to realize that "silence is golden" and that he can often best earn his salary by keeping still and letting the piano work up the picture.

Having heard that Friedman's Theater, at 1302 South Halsted Street, right in the heart of the Ghetto, was enjoying some of the best projection in the city, I went there to investigate, and found a very fine picture indeed. Selig's "It Happened in the West" was on the screen, four days old. "Pretty new," I thought, even for a first reel, but I was further surprised to see that the first reel was the same maker's "Captain Kate," only one day old. This is the more striking, as the most of the competing theaters are independent, and I noticed no other licensed theater nearby. Manager Friedman doesn't seem to think anything is too good for his patrons.

THE JEFFERSON THEATER BREAKING RECORDS.

The Jefferson Theater, corner 55th and Lake Streets, Chicago, is breaking all records for summer business as a neighborhood house, and Manager A. M. Gollos is one of the few Chicago managers who tell us that business is still holding up and that the prospects for fall business loom up as through a glass brightly. At no time, says Mr. Gollos, have we been without enough patrons to make things interesting, and though business did decline during the excessive hot spell, each cool night amply rewarded us and during the past few weeks we have played to as many as 2,000 people in one night, from 6:30 P. M. to 10:30 P. M.

The Jefferson is a neat and attractive little house, with a capacity of about 800. It is well ventilated by open doorways on every side and enough fans to keep the air in circulation. Three reels of Licensed film, a spot and illustrated song, compose the program and Mr. Gollos makes it a point to obtain every good feature film on the market.

Good pictures, good projection, good music and good advertising, and a lively interest in the comfort and welfare of his patrons, form the foundation of his success, and Mr. Gollos is one moving picture man who realizes the necessity of spending money to make money. The five-cent policy is adhered to and satisfaction is evident on every side.

TEMPTATIONS OF A GREAT CITY.

State rights on this feature film are selling fast. All the New England States have been contracted for by Feighery and Place of New York City; Missouri and Ohio by Chas. L. Marshall, Excelsior Springs, Mo.; Pennsylvania to E. B. Clark, Dubois, Pa.; Ohio to W. C. Smith; Jos. L. Hopp, of the Standard Film Exchange, Chicago, secured Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Indiana and Michigan.

TO THE MOVING PICTURE EXHIBITORS of the United States and Canada.

Gentlemen: I wish to remind you that the National Exhibitors' Convention will be held at Cleveland, Ohio, on Tuesday, August 1st. The convention will last three days. Now, Brother Exhibitors, it is up to you to make this convention a grand success. There are many matters pertaining to our business which need to be adjusted. You cannot alone do anything, but through organization you can get results. Come to the convention. Get acquainted with the exhibitors from all over the United States and Canada. Give the men in our line of business the benefit of your knowledge of what you know about the business. If you have any grievances, Cleveland is the place to state them and it is a duty you owe the moving picture exhibitors. If you know of anything beneficial to the business, be at Cleveland and enlighten the exhibitors. If you stay at home, quit your kicking. Remember, the Lord helps those that help themselves. Don't expect to stay at home in order to save a dollar and depend upon other exhibitors to work early and late that you may receive the benefits. It is time that every exhibitor become aroused to the fact that the meeting at Cleveland is the greatest event in the history of the moving picture world and that our destiny depends upon the meeting at Cleveland being a great success. Stop and think of all the injustice imposed upon you and then remember that it is only by and through organization that you can get a fair and square deal from everybody. Wake up! Get the right focus and when the light is turned on, you will see a new picture by a National Exhibitor's League, and the motto will be "A Square Deal for All; Live and Let Live."

M. A. NEFF, President.

A FILM MANUFACTURER'S ENTERPRISE.

Realism in moving pictures is of the greatest importance, for this is a thing which is always appreciated by the public. Some film makers go to great expense to make a scene look real. As an example, the Pathe American Company, in need of a genuine explosion at sea, contracted with the owner of an old two-masted schooner, paying him over a thousand dollars for the privilege of blowing it up with dynamite. The event occurred on July 14th, off Islip, in Great South Bay. A crowd of newspaper reporters and photographers of the daily newspapers were on hand, and as the scene was laid so far from shore, the Pathe people chartered a large yacht which was placed at their disposal. Owing to the haste of departure, provisions were overlooked, and it was a famished band that landed at Islip at 6 p. m., after eight hours at sea with nothing but water to drink and not even a sandwich to eat. This was the pathetic side of the event, the humorous was the precautions taken by the onlookers to stuff their ears with cotton to deaden the sound of the explosion, and the excuses offered by the owner of the yacht to keep at a safe distance, When the scenes had been carefully rehearsed and the explosion did occur late in the afternoon, the report and effect was somewhat disappointing, but the shattered timbers of the vessel shot into the air amid a cloud of smoke, and another sacrifice to art was recorded by the cameras. These were quite near to the ship, but placed on a substantial raft and covered with a timber shield to protect them from the falling splinters. We understand that a very satisfactory film was obtained, the release date of which will be watched with interest. It will be one of the most expensive films ever produced, other scenes besides the explosion being staged at great cost.

THE MICHIGAN STATE CONVENTION OF EXHIBITORS.

Mr. Dintenfass, of the Champion Films Co., and Mr. Horsley, of the Nestor Co., who were appointed to represent the Sales Co. at the State Convention of Michigan, arrived at Detroit on Wednesday, July 5th and they met the boys that day at the meeting hall, where the exhibitors were busy in conference. Mr. Dintenfass sent in his card and he was immediately interviewed and he took the opportunity of inviting the entire meeting at the expense of the Sales Co. to luncheon. The invitation was accepted with three large cheers, and it was but a short time before about thirty-five exhibitors, of which the majority were Independent, also representatives of the Patents Company's exchanges, and Mr. Hardin, representative of the Edison Co., found themselves at the festive board doing justice to hearty repast.

We are informed that as a result of this meeting the exhibitors have organized for the betterment of conditions and for the elevating of the industry at large, which is highly commendable.

Technique of the Photoplay

By EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Copyright 1911 by E. W. Sargent. All rights reserved.

Chapter II. Scenario Form.

The photoplay manuscript consists of two essential parts—the scenario and the synopsis. Cast and scene plot are optional, but it is better to give these since they are easily prepared and aid the editor in forming a quick estimate of the demands of the plot in the matter of people and settings.

Wherever possible, the manuscript should be typewritten. Some of the companies follow the general magazine practise and do not require their editor to read the manuscript done in long hand, but most editors will at least read a synopsis if the handwriting is legible.

If written in long hand, a good black ink should be used in preference to color; the lines should not be run together and there should be no attempt made at ornamentation with red or other colored inks. For written manuscripts the paper should be white, unruled, and either 8½ by 11 inches or 8½ by 5½ inches. The first is the regular letterhead size and the latter is known as "commercial note." Where the note sized is used the writing should be across the long way of the paper.

With the typewriter the paper should be the 8½ by 11 inch size, although some authors prefer the half sheets as being more conveniently handled by the reader. The larger sheet is the more generally used, but the 8½ x 13 and the old-fashioned foolscap should be avoided by typist and penman alike. They are the certain signs of the novice.

Typewriter paper may be either white or a light buff, of a quality costing not less than sixty cents for a box of 500 sheets. A light but strong bond paper costing about $1.25 a box is advised. The additional expense is not great and the difference in the appearance of the manuscript is worth a hundred times the cost. A neat businesslike manuscript will prejudice the editor in your favor and may influence the payment made for your story.

For typing, a black ribbon is better than the more common purple or the more uncommon green. A one-color ribbon is better than the two color, and it will pay to renew the ribbon before it gets so worn that the imprint fades to a light grey. The "record" ribbon should be used in place of the "copying," which is likely to spread and make a manuscript unsightly after a few handlings.

Your Address Is Important.

Your name and address should appear at the top of he first page of your synopsis and at the top of the first page and the bottom of the last page of your scenario. It is not sufficient that your name and address are given in a letter accompanying the manuscript, nor is it enough that your name appears once on the manuscript. If you send out much manuscript it will pay you to obtain a rubber stamp with your name and full address and a black ink-pad. With this you can stamp your address on the sheets with small trouble. The best stamp carries the name in twelve-point gothic and the address in ten-point of the same face. Smaller than that will not be legible in rubber.

Except on the first sheets of the synopsis and scenario, the title of the story should be typed at the top of each sheet in the left hand corner. The pages of the scenario should be numbered in consecutive order. The synopsis sheet—if there is a second—need not be numbered but carries the title.

A carbon or pen copy of all manuscript should be retained by the author to guard against loss in the mails or in the studio. The editor is not responsible for lost manuscript, although he is supposed to use all reasonable care, and manuscripts are occasionally lost.

Manuscript should be sent out held together by a pin or a paper clip. One of the forms of clip which does not perforate the paper is best, since it keeps the manuscript in better shape. Do not use permanent staples, McGill fasteners, or sew or glue your sheets together. Keep it so that the removal of a single clip will permit the editor to handle the loose sheets.

Do not write on both sides of the paper, and do not roll your manuscript.

Putting the sheets in the wrong order or fastening two pages together "to see if they have been read" are favorite devices of the novice, but they are known to the editor. Do not do it. An editor does not have to read every page to arrive at the estimate of the story. He reads enough to satisfy himself that it is not available. The editor is far more anxious to take the story than you are to have him. Do not try to trap him.

Making a Price.

If you have set a price on the manuscript mark that price in plain figures on the first page. If you cannot determine the value follow the general custom and mark it "submitted at usual rates." This should be typed or written in the upper right hand corner of the first page. Do not convey the information by letter. The letter may become lost.

The more common practise is to offer the manuscript at the usual rates and if the price is not satisfactory send no more to that firm. Do not write in advance and ask how much will be paid for a manuscript. There is no fixed price. The value is determined by the merit of the plot and the amount of work required of the editorial staff to get it in shape for the director. This varies with each manuscript and the editor cannot tell you without having seen the manuscript. The average manuscript will bring from $10 to $40, although some advertise that they pay from $10 to $100.

Fold your 8½ x 11 sheet in three (making two folds), using only sufficient force on the folds to cause them to lay flat. This will give you a package 8½ x 3⅔ inches. Place this in an envelope just large enough to contain it. Address this cover to yourself and stamp it with one two-cent stamp. If the postage is more than the two cents the effort of the postmaster or carrier to collect the postage will serve the same practical purpose as registration. Do not seal this envelope, but place it in a larger sized envelope which you will seal and address to the secenario editor of the firm to which your manuscript is to be sent.

The half-sheet paper, if used, should not be folded, but should be sent in an envelope sufficiently large to contain it without folding, and this in turn in the mailing cover. The postoffice can furnish the two sizes required for the large sheets, but it is better to use a stouter manila envelope. Do not use the cheaper sorts.

Pay the Going Postage.

In any event, the postage should be fully prepaid on the outer cover. If you use only one grade of stationery, find out how many sheets of paper with the two envelopes will weigh one ounce and how many sheets will weigh the same. Once this is known you can figure the charges for yourself.

Most companies will acknowledge receipt of the manuscript within a week, but if you wish a receipt, register the letter and state at the time that a receipt is demanded, otherwise none will be sent you. You should hear from your story in from six to eight weeks. If no answer comes, make inquiry, always enclosing a stamped and self-addressed envelope for reply. Your letter should state the title of the story and the date it was sent.

The standard of measurement of a manuscript is not the number of words, but the length of the finished film. A 5,000-word manuscript may only make a half reel. The thousand foot reel is the film yardstick. Eighteen to thirty scenes, according to their length, make a full reel, which will run 18 to 20 minutes, but it must be remembered that scenes are quickly played. Study some pictures on the screen and you will be better able to judge.

Only original ideas are wanted. Adaptations of standard literature are made by the editorial department. If you send these in as such they will be returned. If you make adaptations and offer them as original, you may be able to sell them, but you are required to sign a receipt that will convict you of obtaining money under false pretences if your trickery is discovered. No editor or staff can be familiar with all of the stories written, but it is almost certain that the picture will be seen by some person who will detect the fraud and advise the manufacturer. Stick to your own ideas.

Be Explicit but Brief.

Follow the general style of this sample scenario, making your synopsis explicit and interesting, but keeping it as short as possible. The synopsis gives the editor in a half page the plot of the play, and if you cannot interest him in the synopsis the scenario will not be read.

The sample scenario is not submitted as a model photoplay, but was devised to present most of the points to be discussed in later chapters. The scenario proper should be started on a fresh sheet, no matter how much space is left on the last synopsis sheet. A margin is left on the left hand side of the scenario for scene numbers and to call attention to inserts.

FOR HIS SISTER'S SAKE.

A dramatic photoplay in 23 scenes, requiring 4 interior and 7 exterior settings.

Synopsis.

Dick Blake, about to go West to take a position on a ranch, asks Neli Horton to marry him. She assents, but her father refuses to give his consent and orders Dick out of the house. That night, while on his way to the telegraph office to wire his acceptance of the offered position, Dick passes the Horton home and sees a burglar working over the safe. He enters the house to discover that the thief is Neli's scapegrace brother. He is surprised by Horton under conditions which lead him to believe Dick to be the thief, and is about to call the police when Nell threatens to shoot herself if he does. Dick is permitted to go, but Neli, not knowing that his silence is to shield her brother, makes it plain that she believes him guilty. Two years later Boh is sent West in disgrace. He is befriended by Dick, now manager of the ranch. He is wounded in a gambling row in which he is caught cheating, and before he dies, writes a confession of guilt, which is sent to Neil unknown to Dick. She comes West and over Boh's grave they renew their troth.

Scenario.

1—Parlor in Horton home. Neli reading—jumps up to greet Dick, who is grave but happy—she sees that there is something important—he takes letter from pocket and hands her—she reads.

On screen—Letter.

Dear Dick,
There is an opening for you to start as assistant foreman and work up. Report within ten days.
Yours,
Chester.

Back to scene—Nell claps hands—sobers at the thought that Dick must go away—he offers her ring—pretty love scene—she accepts—points to door—Dick pretends to be afraid—both laugh—Dick exits through door. Match exit to next scene.

2—Library—Horton at desk—looks up with scowl as Dick enters—Dick speaks—Horton angry—furious negative—Dick argues

3—Parlor as in 1—Nell listening at door—smile changes to dismay—opens door and exits into library.

4—Library as in 2—Dick and Horton arguing—Neli enters and joins Dick in his plea without result—Horton orders them both from the room—they exit.

5—Parlor as in 1—Dick and Nell enter—Nell crying—Dick tries to comfort her—Mrs. Horton enters—looks perplexed—Dick explains—she comforts Nell—Bob enters—explanations—Boh not interested—Nell and Dick exit—Boh demands money—mother pleads but gives up the few bills in her purse—Bob exits triumphantly—mother looks after him in distress.

Leader—That evening.

6—Dick's room—Dick pacing floor—pauses—sits at table and writes—reads:

On screen—Telegraph blank.

George Chester,
Elk Horn, Nev.
Accept offer. Leaving tomorrow.
Dick.

Back to scene—Dick lays paper down—gets hat and coat—at door—pauses—turns and takes telegram—exits.

7—Street (night) Dick comes into picture—pauses—looks off as though hearing noise—vaults over fence—exits in direction of sound.

8—Exterior of house with window (night). Shutters closed—Dick steals in—peers through blinds.

9—Library as in 2. Scene taken through mask to suggest that it is what Dick sees through shutters. Bob is bending over safe—his features are not visible.

10—Back to 8—Dick throws open shutters carefully—about to climb in.

11—Back to 9—Dick enters—Boh rises—presents gun—Dick surprised—Boh brazen—both start as noise is heard—Boh shoves money into Dick's hands—escapes through window—Horton enters—has gun—Dick throws up hands—Neli and Mrs. Horton enter—Neli shocked—Horton sneeringly points to Dick.

12—Window as in 8—Boh listening—smiles.

Leader—For his sister's sake Dick is silent.

13—Back in library—Horton questioning Dick, who refuses to speak—Horton takes up telephone, laying down gun—Nell snatches up gun—points it at her own head—father alarmed—Nell points to phone—Horton reluctantly puts down instrument—Nell lowers gun but retains it—Horton motions Dick to go—he appeals to Nell—she will not listen—Dick exits—Nell faints in mother's arms.

Leader—Two years have passed. Boh is sent West in disgrace.

14—Station platform—Nell and Bob enter—Neli tearful—Boh sullen—Horton enters from station—hands Boh long strip ticket—refuses to say good-bye—train coming—Boh kisses Nell—boards train—train leaves—Nell tearful—Horton moved but tries to keep up appearance of indifference.

Leader—The manager of the Cross and Ball ranch comes to town.

15—Western scene—in front of the Crimson Dog saloon—Boh, Mendez and others loafing in front—Boh guying Mendez, who draws a knife—as he is about to strike Dick enters and catches upraised hand with knife—and as Mendez sees who it is he slinks away—Dick beckons—ranch buckboard is driven in—Dick wants Boh to come—Boh refuses—asks for money—Dick gives bills from roll—last appeal—Bob still refuses—Dick climbs into buckboard and drives off—Bob waves bills—invites all hands in to have a drink—all exit into saloon.

16—Interior of saloon—table in foreground with Boh, Mendez and others gambling—Boh winning and exultant—Mendez ugly—Bob rakes in pot—cards to him—he deals new hand—all drop out but Boh and Mendez—they raise until Mendez calls—with a laugh Boh shows his hand—Mendez grasps Boh's wrist.

17—Bust showing table with money and hands of Bob and Mendez—Mendez has grasped Boh's right wrist and with his left hand draws out two cards from cuff—releases hand—all hands vanish from scene.

18—Back to 16—Mendez and Bob standing. Mendez holds up cards—drops them—grabs gun—other players drop to floor.

19—Exterior as in 15—Cowboys and Mexicans as before—all jump up and hustle into saloon—last man pauses at door—Doctor enters scene and exits into saloon—last man follows.

20—Back to 18—Boh lies face down across table—cards and money scattered—Mendez stands over him with smoking pistol—others rise from the floor and men from 19 enter with Doctor—Doctor turns Bob over—Barkeeper brings whiskey—given to Bob—he opens eyes—Doctor examines wound—shakes head—Boh speaks—Barkeeper exits—Doctor staunches wound—Barkeeper enters with paper, pen and ink—writes at Boh's dictation.

On screen—Letter.

Dear Nell:

They've got me. Serves me right. Dick Blake has acted like a trump. I might as well confess that I stole the money from Dad and he shielded me. Make it right. Good bye,
Back to scene—Boh signs the letter—falls back—Doctor pronounces him dead—Men take Mendez off—tableau.

21—Ranch house—Dick on piazza—cowboy rides into picture—gives Dick telegram—Dick reads:

On screen—Telegram.

Richard Blake,
Elk Horn, Nev.
Am arriving 3.20. Please meet me.
Nell.

Back to scene—Dick calls servant, who brings coat and hat from house—cowboy comes up with pony—Dick mounts and rides out of picture.

22—Western railroad station—Dick enters—train comes—Nell alights—in mourning—Dick greets her with tender respect—takes satchel and leads off scene—loungers regard her with pity.

23—Lonely spot—fresh grave with rude headstone—Dick enters with Nell—points to grave—she breaks down—collects herself—places flowers on grave—Dick watches her with pity—Nell rises—offers paper:

On screen—Flash a few feet of Bob's letter (now signed) to identify.

Back to scene—Dick gravely returns letter—she looks appealingly at him as though asking forgiveness for her doubts—he takes her into his arms—kisses her once, reverently—they look down at grave and, moved by a common impulse, they kneel.

CANADIAN FEATURE CORONATION PICTURES.

From the Family Theater, Ottawa, Canada, we receive a sumptuous program rendered in that theater on July 5, under the auspices of the St. George Society, the Sons of England and the Boy Scouts. Earl Grey, the Governor-General of Canada, also honored the gathering with his presence and the function created quite some talk in the local press. We congratulate Manager Ken. Finlay on his brilliant success.

Mr. Charles Farrell, the promoter of motion picture theaters in Buffalo, N. Y., has recently installed Motiograph machines, compensarcs, Lang's Rewinders and other accessories since June 10th in the Unique, Riverside, Liberty, Fillmore Sycamore, Palace and Cazenovia theaters. Mr. Farrell is a live wire in the picture business, selling motiograph machines, mirror screens, opera chairs, and also building theaters.

Observations by our Man About Town

It may have been one year ago, or it may have been two, three, four or five years ago, the prediction was made, that the small exhibitors would eventually give way to the onward march of the larger one. If I am not mistaken, the prediction was made at a time when the municipal authorities were working against what was, at that time called, the tenement house nickelodeons. At that time every tailor, grocer, fruit dealer and tinsmith who could not see money coming in fast enough to meet his expectation as compared with the receipts of a small nickelodeon on a neighboring block, was imbued with the thought that his whole salvation rested in the moving pictures.

We all know the result. If the municipal authorities had not stepped in with their regulations, there would not be any small commercial storerooms in existence, and the fire insurance companies would never been driven to the wall by losses. However, they stepped in and people who lived over a popular place of amusement had to move.

* * *

So, through the gradual transformations, reformations and other actions, we find that, even with the tenants removed—even with the most delicately contrived means of exit and the most ingeniously planned means of ventilation, the small show is doomed to go. Tough, isn't it?

Have you heard of the latest municipal regulation about to be launched? No? Listen! After January 1, 1912, if all signs prove true, there will not be a moving picture place seating less than five hundred (500), in Greater New York. As I understand it, the seating capacity for moving picture houses will be increased in the very near future to five hundred (500), and the license fee for the houses will be increased from $25 to $100.

I was told this was advance information, but nevertheless correct, that the spirit of advance was behind it and idle-lying capital was prepared to step in and supply all sources of amusement that might be killed by it. I do not doubt, in the slightest degree, the sincerity of my informant, for I know that within the past twelve months the motion (or moving, if you will), picture has at last imbedded upon the minds of many people, who heretofore ridiculed it, a retrieving thought.

* * *

A recent number of one of the most prominent theatrical publications in the City of New York proved this. I refrain from designating the source of publication for the reason that it simply reiterates what the papers devoted to the interests of the moion picture business have been contending for years past. I will be content in quoting in one paragraph the headlines of the articles this prominent journal used in its efforts to arouse the public to a realization of how important a factor the motion picture is in the amuscment world. This is how the headline read: "Is it not time to take a hand in 'Censorship' some? The professional 'reformer' is running amuck and there appears to be no organized effort to stop his pernicious work, which is gaining ground all the time, absurdity that is a menace. Moving picture interests attacked as was no other reputable body of industry captains." Oh, my! and after all these long days—I will not say years—we have a champion coming forth from the legitimate theatrical field!

Well, it is gratifying to have friends, regardless of from whence they come, but there is a measurement for friends. The utterances quoted are true, even if they may not come from the whole wool, and the people who have given voice to them through the darkest days should receive first recognition. The Moving Picture World has been voicing the sentiments quoted for a long time and I, as one of its correspondents, suggest that if the outburst is to produce any bouquets, that the first be thrown at the men who have stood behind the guns.

Yes, the professional reformer has been running amuck, in spite of the fact that the work it attacked has been endorsed by true reformers conscientiously performing their work. Yes, such has been the case in spite of the constant plea of the motion picture people that they were backed by a "reputable body of industry captains." Heretofore, the regular theatrical journals who were not fed by advertisements have treated the pictures as a joke, the manufacturers as criminals, and the exhibitors as abettors of a crime. Now, we quote from the Morning Telegraph of a recent date, "the men engaged in the moving picture business are numerous enough, and of commercial and personal standing sufficient to put a stop to these unjust attacks." But let us go a step farther and read: "This espionage of a reputable business is outrageous. The Motion Picture Patents Co., and the Sales Company would be entirely justified in taking the young men who sit around their places to 'censorize' films, gently but firmly by the ear and lead them to the door, with the grim order to stay on the outside. Never before in the history of the world, has a body of men engaged in a high-class work, and one that is adapted to the highest civilization, so complacently suffered themselves to be misrepresented and their interests assailed."

* * *

Now, what do you think of that? And it did not come from a trade joudnal, either, but from a purely disinterested theatrical journal. I never thought I would reach such a fountain of truth until it became my happy lot to reach the hereafter. I was inclined to doubt the sincerity of the writer until I re-read his article and I struck that passage, "a splendid business crippled by slander and 'fake' reformation." Then I knew he was in earnest and I did not expect to meet him with a special advertising scale.

* * *

I like spirit in which the article from which I have quoted is written, and I hope the publication will back up the spirit in future issues, maintaining in all its sense the loved declaration of ages, "Let justice be done, though the heavens should fall."

* * *

In opening his sermon one Sunday, an old Southern preacher said: "A false balance is an abomination to the Lord; but a just weight is his delight." Look out, Mr. Advertisingman.

Do you know Mr. Ganes? Don't ye? Why, yes yer do. He runs a purtty little picture house up on Broadway in New York. Yas, and he didn't want to become an abomination, so he put out a lot of galvanized iron tubs in front of his picture house and filled 'em with water, so that the poor, over-heated horses could get wet outside as well as inside. He told his men to turn the hose on them when they came along to drink. An' what do you think? The water department got at him and threatened him with a fine of five dollars a day for using the water that way. Like Eva Tanguay, Ganes didn't care a million. He said to his men, "shoot 'er up," and they did, and, ha! ha! le' me tell you, the people just flocked there to all the disturbance. Mr. Ganes didn't care. He just said, "Turn on the water! Put on another roll of tickets!" And he had the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty of Animals behind him. They were on duty outside the house, of course. But here's luck to Ganes.

The ingenious constructor of advertisements is busy in my part of the moving picture field. One house in the Bronx displays this sign:

"The coolest place in the city. This theater is twenty degrees below the street."

In Brooklyn a man tries to kill the opposition of an airdome with this sign:

"Come into the iced air and enjoy the beautiful ballads, where the mosquitoes do not bite."

The opposition is spending his spare moments in the Jersey meadows trying to get hip on the process for the abolition of mosquitoes.

Union City, Tenn.—The Gem Theater, Mr. W. C. Morris, manager, is one of the most up-to-date show houses in the South, playing to capacity with pictures only. Seating capacity 340, all upholstered opera chairs.

The Scenario Theater, Ocean Grove, N. J., has recently installed a set of Deagan's Musical Bells which seem to delight the audience very much. The "Scenario" is turning them away under the management of Salo Ansbach.

Education and Science

FROM DAGUERREOTYPE TO CINEMATOGRAPH.

There died in this city last week two men whose lives were singularly connected with photography. One of these men, George Gardner Rockwood, was one of the earliest pioneers of the art of photography, beginning with the daguerreotype, he was the first to use the carte-de-visite style in this country. Associated with a large and influential class of people he probably photographed more famous personages than any other artist; his name became famous all over the photographic world, so that it is recorded that no fewer than 350,000 persons had their portraits taken in his studio. The other death was that of Albert Brighton, a sad victim of the wonderful progress and development of photography; while acting before the camera this young man of talent and promise sacrificed his life in a way that will lead to greater caution in the future.

The ending of those two lives have brought before the world the vital importance of the marvelous and speedy growth of the power of reproduction by photography. During the lifetime of one man, that which was impossible even in a dream in the beginning of his career, became an every day event before that career ended. Rockwood, photographer as an art, honor and riches grew together and his death marks the end of a chapter in the world's history as thus related.

The daguerreotype now seems to belong to a distant age rather than to a recent generation; yet, was it not the beginning from which grew our present mighty possibilities? It is well, then, to think them together in their historical relationship; it is sad, however, that this link should have been made so prominent by the tragic death of one a victim to progress, while that of the other was the natural passing away of an honored life with its time and its oppotrunities which a new generation takes up, leaving the daguerreotype behind forever and going forward with the cinematograph.

"The Marvels of Horsemanship" (Edison) is a film which must certainly be noticed in this place. A series of pictures of troops of the United States cavalry is full of interest to every one. There can be little doubt that this film will cause many surprises; while it is well known that the horse soldier is capable of heroic acts, it is not well known that whole troops are ready to perform such extraordinary evolutions as those which are witnessed here. The film is well named, for "marvels of horsemanship" is a wonderful exhibition equally creditable to the horse as to the man; truly here, as seldom ever witnessed, is the horse shown as the obedient servant and friend of man. It would be hard to decide if the feats of dexterity or the rhythmic movements were the most surprising, suffice it to say that as a film at once interesting and instructive it is worthy of praise and should be seen by every American youth and adult.

"Birds in Their Nests" (Pathe) is another valuable addition to the splendid list of Educational subjects this firm is putting forth. Natural history made attractive will be the future form for the schoolboy. The study of birds is always pleasing to young people, and the schoolroom has never been dull when this theme was presented; the naturalist was a welcome friend even in book form. With what enthusiasm these living pictures will be viewed can be better imagined than described. The homes, habits and haunts of birds no longer described in cold type with a wood engraving, but the real living example before their eyes; the writer can even now in fancy hear the enthusiasm evoked: Splendid pictures! give us more, and more, and then —some more. Thank you.

"The Star Spangled Banner" (Edison).—Historical, educational, prophetical. Historical as recording that which is of such importance to be recorded as a history making incident. Educational, because it teaches both the origin and purpose of a song that will live as long as the flag flies. Prophetical, because it is such films as these that in days to come will establish in the lives of future Americans those principles which should best be preserved.

While this film is thus good, no one will be offended if it be suggested that for perfection it might be re-enacted with the threefold objects heading this note kept in view. Thereby could much "over-acting" be eliminated, and the value of all participating be centered upon the production of a film which shall not only satisfy the immediate pleasure of a July 4th audience, but fill any occasion truly American upon either platform or rostrum.

This is spoken with the view of making such valuable films as these of permanent worth, with a presentation that shall be more pertinent to the great theme than to the enactment of a drama. This is one of a few possible subjects where the inspiration of the audience testifies to its full or proportionate value; the results should be full; when they are, the perfection has been reached.

"The Old Folks' Sacrifice" (Vitagraph) deserves a word of comment—not only because it strikes a new chord, but because it reveals a phase of life much neglected in the multitude of stories told by picture. The kindly pathos is heart-warming and the lessons suggested may prove valuable to many a young scapegrace.

While the redemption of the grandson is taken for granted, it would be much more satisfying if the subject had continued with the presentation in actual life of that result which is left to be presumed.

The regenerated young man, even in a slight degree compensating the old people with his thankfulness, would have been welcome.

"Benares, the Holy City of the Hindoos," is another welcome Pathe scenic, helpful in the fact that in addition to its scenic values it teaches very important customs of the Hindoos, such as the disposal of their dead by fire or water, as the case may be. If publicity leads to reform in America surely such special publicity which comes from moving picture descriptions, will do much towards correcting abuses which exist side by side with such occult wisdom as that professed by the Hindoos. Pictures of this kind will serve more purposes than one.

THE BEST TEACHER OF GEOGRAPHY IS THE MOVING PICTURE.

"The time is coming," says the "Daily Colonist," of Victoria, British Columbia, "and it cannot come any too soon, when the teaching of geography, and to some extent, history, will be revolutionized by the introduction of moving pictures into the school rooms.

No subject has suffered so much at the hands of the careless, the stupid, or even the painfully conscientious teacher, as geography. Most of us can remember the hours we have fruitlessly spent in learning lists of names or paragraphs of dry and uninteresting facts, which scarcely remained in our memories longer than examination day.

Even the task of map-drawing was a dreary one when the country or continent represented little to our intelligence or imagination but lines and dots, and if we were fortunate a little color.

The skilful teacher could, indeed, by appealing to the children's sense of location, create interest and rivalry in finding places on the map. But it was seldom that the children of past generations realized that living people worked and played and suffered in what were to them really foreign lands.

"The moving pictures bring before the children all that in the old days was left out. The people of every land, their occupations, their costumes, and their customs, will be only less familiar to the pupils of a well-taught school than to one who has travelled.

The scenery and products, the trade and commerce, and the trains will all be shown. The teacher who cannot arouse interest, sympathy and enthusiasm with such aids must be dull indeed.

There are many uses to which moving pictures may be put, but perhaps there are none in which its possibilities are so great as in the education of the young."

Music for the Picture

By CLARENCE E. SINN

I enjoyed a treat a few evenings since. Prowling around the various picture theaters just to hear how other folks play pictures, I wandered into the Ideal Theater (North Avenue and Larrabee) and though the weather was very warm the house was packed. It took some little time to find an empty seat, but the quality of the show explained the large attendance. I remained for two pictures—"Tragic Wedding" and "Tabarin's Wife," both Pathe releases. The projection was excellent, but of course I was more interested in the musical accompaniment to the pictures. Here is where I had the treat. It is not often one has the pleasure of hearing music (mostly extempo) that sounds as if it were written expressly for that particular picture. It is difficult to convey in cold type a concise idea of descriptive music, but I have a mind to attempt it.

"Tabarin's Wife" was introduced with an allegro movement similar to the opening of a French "Opera Bouffe." This held throughout the first scene, diminishing where necessary to allow the drum rolls to come into prominence, and introducing strong marked chords to emphasize the poses of the actor who reads the announcement of the performance. Dominant idea of the music in this scene— vivacious, fortissimo and theatrical. In the next scene showing the meeting of the wife with her admirer, the music changed slightly to something of a more sentimental nature, though not departing far from the original theme. In the following scenes showing the interior of the play house, the music increased both in tempo and volume. As the curtain rose a distinct theme was introduced abruptly, descriptive of "curtain music." The scenes in the dressing room and on the stage were "shaded" according to the action (which was mostly lively), until Tabarin finds the note, then it took on an agitated character until end of that scene, when he appears on the stage, back to the original motif which develops into a strong agitato until her lover kneels over her body, then wildly plaintive. I know this conveys a very incomplete idea of Mr. Thomson's creditable work, and I hope he will forgive me if I have overlooked anything.

The other picture, "Tragic Wedding," was chiefly noticable from its long chases on horseback and the "grilling" hurries that were called for. These were worked in a very effective manner; softly, as the riders appeared in the distance, and swelling to forte as they approached the foreground; each time a group of riders halted for a moment, ritard and a few ad lib chords indicative of the restive stamping horses. Scene after scene of this sort of thing, and I believe that the applause the picture received was largely due to the excellent manner in which it was accompanied both as to music and sound effects. They relieved what might otherwise have bordered closely to monotony. That the audience appreciated it was evident even they may not all have realized exactly what contributed to the making of a "good show."

At another theater "Marked for Life" (Reliance) was seen. The picture is a beautiful one and its projection was in harmony, but the music was simply a hodge-podge of popular stuff, none of which could possibly have any bearing on the subject. While you looked at the beautiful scene between Travis and his mother you listened to "Come Take a Trip in My Flying Machine." Another pretty scene was accompanied by "Oceana Roll." With one or two exceptions it was like that all through. The exceptions noted were in the "musical" scenes where a pianist and a violinist were supposed to play their respective instruments. The piano player worked to these scenes which indicated that he was watching the picture. Then why did he play music so out of keeping in the remainder of the picture?

Apropos, why are so few "violin" pictures produced in which the actor imitates the motions of a real violinist? Even when playing a country fiddler the average actor seems to have little idea of how a fiddler holds his bow and instrument, nor of how he uses them. Criticism of these details is not confined to professional musicians. The average audience will contain others who know what is right or wrong, and technical details are surely worth being brought out correctly if they are worth putting on at all. When a violinist is introduced in a picture, the character usually plays an important part. It doesn't add to the performance to hear some one in the audience exclaim: "That fellow isn't playing—see how he holds his bow—look at that elbow—why didn't they get some one to tell him," and so on. Other instruments being more easily imitated as to pantomime, do not suffer so much.

A letter from Pennsylvania bears the following question: "How can it be possible for an orchestra to play to the pictures?" The writer states that he improvises a great part of his accompanying music and depends upon memory for the balance. Those of my readers who work their pictures in the same manner will need no explanation of the question above. For the benefit of others it may be mentioned that the best pianists (who improvise) are more or less familiar with standard music of various kinds, whether it be operatic, dramatic, symphonic, or all of these. What I mean is that they have played or heard enough of this sort of descriptive music to have a pretty definite idea of the requirements musically of a scene almost at a glance. Now whether they should aptly recall a bit from their repertoire or compose something "out of their own heads," as one correspondent puts it, it really does not matter so long as it fits the situation. This for the starter. As the picture develops his musical changes according to action.

I have tried several times to give on this page a synopsis of such work by different pianists I have heard, as it is only by analysis of past picture music that one can give any definite idea of what may come. In Brother Thomson's rendition of "Tabarin's Wife," as referred to above, he may have begun with the opening of some standard opera for all I know—if so I failed to recognize it. But whether he did or not made no essential difference. He kept his eye on the picture and humored his music—slower, faster, louder, softer, or modulated to other themes as the shifting situations demanded. To improvise intelligently on a given theme, changing it to meet all situations as they develop and at the same time give a smooth and connected rendition implies a gift of no mean order. But to those who are not thus equipped I offer the suggestion that it is not necessary to compose all your own music; the greater part can be memorized (I know it is being successfully done), and the little connecting links or modulations are a matter of practice once you get the hang of it. So are little things like "humoring" the action (really these can be made very important matters if one cares to take the pains). The whole secret lies in the willingness to take pains. There are those who say "what's the difference" or "what's the use." In their cases there's very little difference and not much use.

To get back to what I started to say. Taking the hypothesis that the bulk of your music can be selected (of which it can if your repertoire and memory are equal to the demand), and that the "connecting links" form the principal part of your improvisation, it follows that an orchestra can proceed along these lines in a general way. While nothing is impossible, it must be admitted that it is highly improbable that any number of musicians will be banded together who are so thoroughly en rapport as to follow a leader through all the little subtleties that might be given by a pianist working alone; but the orchestra has other resources which will make up in part for this lacking. There are violinists as well as pianists who can take a given theme and humor it to almost any emotion—lively, pathetic, agitated; major or minor; waltz or march; piano or forte, etc. Giving such a one a pianist who unlerstands and can follow him, there is no reason why the results should not be even more satisfactory than when given by a piano alone. With such a team for the nucleus of your orchestra, the rest would not be such a difficult matter. It must also be admitted that such a team would be extremely rare, but it is certainly not from want of talent or ability. It may be that the inducements are not sufficiently attractive for the better orchestra players to take up this line of work as a serious proposition. With the most of them it is only a make shift or a fill in until they can find something more to their liking. It may be a long time before conditions are such that the better class of orchestra musicians will give picture playing the serious attention that is now given it by the best piano players in the field, but I cannot believe that it is impossible for the orchestra to give as intelligent a rendering of this work as a piano alone; providing of course that you have the right kind—and this proviso holds good with the pianist at the present stage of the game.

As matters now stand the experience lies mostly with the piano players, and for that reason it is more than likely they will have charge of the music generally in houses where other musicians are added and where it is desired that the pictures shall be properly accompanied. But this does not mean, to my way of thinking, at least, that the balance of ability lies with the pianist; rather say "the balance of experience."

Lyric Theater, St. Louis Mo.

One of the newer modern picture theaters of St. Louis, Mo., is the Lyric, erected at 6th and Pine Streets by John W. Cornelius. The accompanying photograph of the front of the house gives some idea of the ornate scheme of architecture and decoration which has been carried out by the builders, making it the most beautiful of the downtown houses. Six hundred high candle power tungsten lamps and two flaming arc lamps illuminate this front, which is further brightened by an electric sign on top. The lobby and box office is done in Italian marble and on the balcony above the box office are a number of statuettes, which give a pleasing effect.

An interesting feature of the Lyric is its elaborate ventilating plant. The equipment consists of a 78-inch exhaust fan—said to be the largest in use in St. Louis—and thirty cooling fans distributed about the auditorium, having the effect of reducing the temperature some 20 degrees.

The operator's booth is of steel and large enough to accommodate two machines and operators, working constantly. An Edison and a Powers No. 6 have been installed.

In construction the Lyric is of concrete throughout. The floor is sloped so that the screen is visible from every seat in the house. The screen itself is built upon the concrete back wall—a part of the structure. The house seats 600 persons.

It is announced that Licensed pictures will be run at the Lyric. The management is in the hands of Mrs. John W. Cornelius, assisted by John A. Cornelius. Special pictures will be featured as issued, as the Lyric has the reputation of being the feature house of St. Louis.

A Horrible Example

Attention of the Moving Picture World has been called to what may be considered the most astounding expression of inhumanity that has yet come to light, by the following letter:

New York, July 16, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World,

Dear Sir.—I would like to have your valued opinion of a person mean enough to write or approve of the enclosed (writer enclosed copy of advertisement, which we do not reproduce):

Mr. Albert Brighton was a personal friend of the writer. He was loved and respected by all who knew him, and for any manufacturer or producer to use his tragic end as a medium to peddle their wares, seems positively inhuman. Yours truly,

J. C. HAMILTON.

As related in last week's Moving Picture World, Mr. Albert Brighton lost his life while enacting a drowning scene for the Belmar Photoplay Company. Under the circumstances the most common conventions would have suggested some sympathetic expression of regret on the part of the picture maker and good taste would have suppressed the connection between the tragedy and the picture, during the taking of which it happened. No such nice distinction influenced this manufacturer. On the contrary, he rushed to the Morning Telegraph and caused to be inserted in the columns of that publication an advertisement for the picture in question, calling attention to the tragedy and asserting that the death struggles of the unfortunate player lent realism to the film, concluding with a bold-typed admonition to "order now."

We would like to accommodate our correspondent with our true opinion of this film maker's act, but we are free to confess that it would not look well in print. Speaking moderately, however, we would say, that while Mr. Belmar had a right to offer this particular film for sale, his policy of trading upon the fatal misfortune of one of his players was inhuman. If it were possible officially to bar his picture from the theaters we would recommend that measure, but we hope that managers of picture theaters have still sufficient decency and human sympathy to prevent it being exhibited in their houses.

As for the Morning Telegraph, which accepted and published the atrocious advertisement, condemnation cannot be too severe. The thing casts a stigma upon the trade that paper is eager to represent and common decency should have operated to suppress such a glaring example of bad taste. But the Morning Telegraph is a notorious panderer and could not be expected to be influenced by any of the nicer human emotions. Fakirs of the film business are finding it a ready recipient of all their schemes to fool the public with announcements of spurious pictures.

Commenting upon the incident and the advertisement, the New York Times of July 17 contributes the information that the mother of the unfortunate player paid all the expense of transporting the remains to Minnesota for burial, telegraphing the money to the undertaker for that purpose.

STOLEN REELS.

The United Motion Picture Company, 112½ W. Main St., Oklahoma City, Okla., ask us to make the following announcement:

On May 18th a party giving the name of George L. Williams arranged with us by telegraph from Hot Springs, Ark., for a service of 21 reels weekly, for use in a theater he was supposed to be operating at that point. In violation of our usual rule we made shipment, upon his urgent request, without waiting for the execution of the usual contracts. It has later developed that this party accepted the first two C. O. D. shipments containing 12 reels and left for parts unknown, since that time we have been unable to locate him. We will pay $25 for information leading to the apprehension of this party and the recovery of our property. The following is a list of the missing films: 718, "A Child of the Wild"; 781, "As the Master Orders"; 765, "Unreasonable Jealousy"; 663, "Dots and Dashes"; 693, "Keeping His Word"; 695, "Ranchman and Miser"; 624, "Lena Rivers"; 304, "His Yankee Girl"; 646, "The Coward, "The Thief Well Received,'; 311, "Rivalry in Oil Fields"; 618, "Restoration"; 586, "Sinner's Sacrifice."

All reels have the reel number and the initials U. M. P. Co. stamped into them by perforations.

Since Messrs. Keyes Brothers inaugurated Independent photoplays in the Elite Theater in Des Moines, Iowa, which they recently purchased from an amusement company, it has proved a big success.

QUESTIONS ON LAST WEEK'S LESSON.

1.—What happens when light rays pass through a prism?
2. Explain, in detail, what is illustrated by Fig. 30.
3. Of what use is shaded portion of the lens?
4. What is the process of annealing glass?
5. How is it done?
6. What happens if glass of a lens be not properly annealed?
7. What property of the lens would be injured?
8. Explain, in detail, how lenses are ground.

When the lens has been rough and fine ground and is ready for polishing, its surfaces have been rendered so smooth that it is semi-transparent. The process of polishing is similar to that of grinding, except that, instead of emery, sand or diamond dust, polishing powders of very fine grain, such as rouge and putty powder, are used, the mould being first covered with a thin layer of fine cloth or wax. The motion is the same, and is continued until all marks of grinding have been removed and a lustrous black polish obtained. The higher the degree of polish the less the loss by reflection. One would naturally suppose the lens to now be finished, and so it is, if it be a cheap lens, but the surface is still far from being sufficiently accurate for high class photographic or instrument work. The polished surface may be a slightly undulating curve, the irregularities of which may not exceed 1-100,000 of an inch, but in high class lenses even this infinitesimal variation must be removed. Such slight errors cannot be detected by mechanical tests, but by optical tests, dependent for their action on the interference of light, they are readily discovered. Slight irregularities are removed by a tedious process of local polishing with pitch polishers, on specially constructed machines. When one considers all this, an understanding of the vast difference in price between simple commercial lenses, and those for first class optical instruments, fine cameras, etc., is obvious.

The mounting of the lens is another exceedingly important matter, and cheap projection lenses are very poorly mounted. The lens system composed of two or more factors must, for good work, be mounted so that the centers of the curves of all the lenses are exactly in a straight line with each other. This is accomplished by centering each lens in a lathe until the image reflected from its surface is stationary when the lens is revolved. Its edges are then trimmed to fit the mount exactly and as each factor of the combination is treated the same the whole system, when mounted in the tube, is exactly in line. Hard and brittle as glass is it is quite elastic and a lens may be strained so as to injure or change its refractive power by too tight a mount. The mount must be formed so that none of the image forming rays are stopped by any portion of the mount, either when entering or leaving the lens. The distance apart at which the lenses of a doublet are fixed is of much importance, and every individual lens of first grade must be treated separately in this respect. It is not sufficient that they be fixed a standard distance apart, as the least variation in thickness, of the individual combinations, calls for a special adjustment in this respect. This is usually only taken account of in the finer lenses, but it will readily be seen that the distance between the factors of a projection lens cannot be materially altered without seriously injuring the work of the lens.

When one learns the minute accuracy necessary in the making and mounting of lenses for fine photographic and optical instrument work one is amazed that results so creditable can be attained working with the cheap, carelessly made and carelessly mounted lenses used for projection.

For the foregoing description of lens manufacture, as well as for much further information concerning lenses, I am indebted to a most excellent work "Photographic Lenses," by Conrad Beck and Herbert Andrews, published in London, England. This work is very good indeed, and I desire to give it full credit for knowledge obtained from its pages.

But to return to the consideration of light action through lenses: In Fig. 30 we were shown the mechanical construction of a lens, or, rather, its mechanical principle; the same being nothing more or less than a series of prisms of varying angles. It must, however, be carefully remembered that, inasmuch as the lens surface is ground to a curve, the actual surface of each imaginary prism can only be the size of a pin-point, since the angle immediately changes. It therefore follows that in a lens each ray will be, in effect, actually using a separate prism of its own. Try to grasp this idea if you can, and fix it firmly in your mind, since it contains the very foundation stone of lens principle. Having mastered this idea you will have gone far toward mastering lens action, since the action of the prism on light is generally understood.

Bunch of Trouble.—McPherson, Kan., writes: "Here is a bunch of trouble for your consideration: (a) I have an Edison, Model B, machine and cannot keep the lower loop. Tension seems to be all O K. Sprockets are in line; tried new ones, but it did no good. (b) My picture works up and down. Tension springs are all right. Put in new aperture plate, but it made no improvement. I use 110 volt A. C., 60 cycle, through a Halberg economizer, 40 amperes at the arc. Throw is 65 feet, picture 17 feet and the "best in town." Use Bio and Electra, ⅝ cored, top and bottom. The secret of good projection is The Moving Picture World."

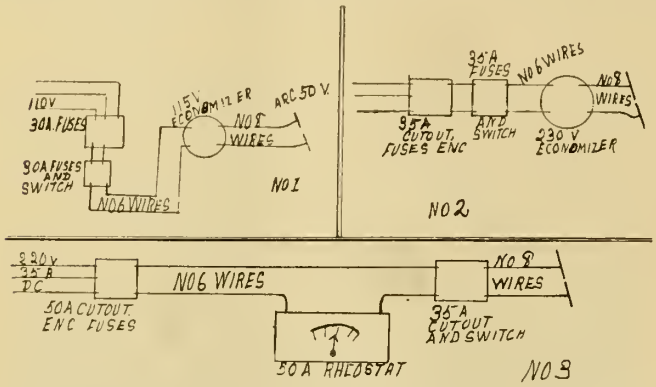
If your sprockets are in line and not worn the loosing of lower loop cannot, of course, be laid to them. Shove your lamphouse over and look at the lower loop carefully to see that it hangs straight; that is to say, that it comes down off the apron, around and up on the sprocket perfectly square. If it doesn't, then the trouble probably lies to some extent there. I do not, at the moment, remember whether or not the Model B has a stripper plate. However, by close examination you will find a way to square the loop if it is out of true. Look at your lower sprocket idler and see that it is not riding on the film with pressure. If the idler bears heavily on the film it will likely cause it to climb, thus loosing the lower loop. When your lower reel is almost full the take-up tension ought to be barely enough to revolve the reel. Anything more is excessive and likely to pull out the lower loop when bad patches go through. You must remember that, when the run first begins and the diameter of the lower film-roll is small, a very little excess of tension means heavy added pull on the film, since the leverage then is far greater than after the film-roll becomes larger. (b) Watch the picture carefully and if the movement up and down occurs four times to each turn of the crank then either your intermittent sprocket is not true or its shaft is sprung. Remove the sprocket and shaft from the machine. Take sprocket off the shaft, put shaft in a lathe and test it. If it is out of true, order a new shaft. If it is true, order a new sprocket. Remember that you are dealing with minute measurements, however. Everything in your 17-foot picture is magnified 204 times (linear magnification, I mean), so that if your sprocket or shaft should be out of true even 5-1000 of an inch, it would mean a movement of a trifle more than one inch on the screen. If the trouble is not found there please write again, describing the movement very carefully. Glad to hear report of good projection in McPherson. Keep up the good work!

Bad Insulation.—Cristobal, Canal Zone, Panama, writes: "Find enclosed $1.50 for handbook. Kindly see that it gets on first steamer. Recently we were troubled with flickering of the light and followed the various suggestions in Projection Department without effect. Finally we discovered the mica insulation had become worn thin on one side, possibly causing an intermittent short circuit by jumping of the current. Since renewing the insulation we have had no further trouble. This may, or may not have been mentioned in the Department, but we send it in for the benefit of others, in case it has not."

We are obliged to the Neighbor for contributing something not before touched upon. Such a condition might possibly arise, provided (a) the lamp be grounded; (b) the insulation of the other arm be bad also. We have been having some tropical weather up here, Cristobal.

Need for Study.—New York City writes: "I have been operating five years. Have had a card for three years, without complaint or charges of any kind being preferred against me. I did not register on time this year and was given another examination and failed to prove myself competent as to my ability as an operator. Now, Mr. Richardson, I would like your help to the extent of looking over enclosed drawings, made by myself and tell me my mistakes, if any."

The brother submits sketches as shown, same having been re-drawn, but without changing anything.



He has evidently done just as thousands of others have, viz: failed to study the details of the business until trouble arose. As long as he could "get by" with inferior knowledge he would not take the trouble to perfect himself in his business by learning every possible detail. Now that he has been, very properly apparently, refused license, the jolt has set him digging and the experience will be, though costly, of great value to him in the end. In No. 1 he has an 110-volt economizer which delivers up to 60 amperes on the secondary, wired with No. 8 wire from economizer to lamp. No. 8 is rated at 33 amperes rubber covered and only 44 weatherproof. On the other side, where No. 8 would not have been overloaded, he has No. 6. He also has 30 ampere fuses on the line side, whereas the economizer could not possibly pull to exceed 26 amperes from the line, working on its highest contact. Inasmuch as a fuse will carry 1/3 overload for a time, it would require an excess of not less than 15 amperes over the capacity of the economizer to blow them, though they might let go with less after several minutes run. In No. 2 we find a far worse proposition. Here the same wire condition exists and, in addition, there are 35 ampere fuses on the line side. The economizer can deliver but 60 amperes. 60 x 35 (the arc voltage) gives 2100 watts, which divided by 220, the line voltage, gives about 10 amperes as the utmost pull from the line, on which are located the fuses. In No. 3 we find 35 ampere fuses behind a 50 ampere rheostat, also No. 8 wires, the capacity of which has been stated. In still another sketch he has 30 ampere fuses on a 35 ampere, non-adjustable rheostat. Now, Neighbor, you say you have been operating five years. Aren't you ashamed not to have learned better than the above in all that time? Plainly you do not know even the rudiments of electrical action. It is very much up to you to get busy. The Board did perfectly right and you have none but yourself to blame. I speak plainly to you, my friend, for you richly deserve it. I trust you will now do what you ought to have done long ago, realize your lack of real knowledge and do some good, hard studying. I publish this as a warning to others. There are many operators in New York, some of them old at the business, who have even greater lack of knowledge than has this friend. Let them take warning before they, too, wake up to find themselves denied license. Now! now!! NOW is the time to do your studying, NOT after you have lost your license. [Note—In re-drawing the sketches I note in Nos. 1 and 2 that the economizers are wound for a somewhat higher voltage than the line-pressure. This would lessen the error, but not correct it. My remarks are still applicable.]

Chromatic Aberration.—Washington (name of town suppressed), writes: "This is the first time you have heard from me, but I am a devoted follower of the Projection Department. I am having some difficulty which I cannot find a remedy for. My picture is fairly good, but not sharp and there is tendency for white objects to have fringe, or outline, of red, white and blue. I tried changing condensers, but without effect. Tried changing terminals, but nothing doing."

There is slight doubt but that your trouble is due to what is called chromatic aberration. Chromatic aberration is the separation of white light more or less into its primary colors. The fault lies in the objective lens. I have taken the matter up with the manufacturers of your machine and they agree to exchange lenses with you. You should hear from them long before this is in print. It is barely possible the trouble is due to your light, but I don't think so. If that were the case the colors would not border the white objects, but show in streaks across them.

A New One Both Ways.—Leadville, Colo., writes: "I see you have published my letter and photos and they look well, but one thing I object to, viz: you cast a doubt on the fact that I am running my arc direct connected to the generator of my motor generator set without resistance.

"Now, if you have any doubt at all about the matter, I will, at your request, have some of the most prominent electricians in the city examine my outfit when in actual operation and will have them make affidavit that there is absolutely no resistance of any kind on the entire D. C. circuit except that natural to the lamp itself (which is a Powers No. 6).

"When you take into consideration the fact that the D. C. voltage is only 50 and the capacity 25 amperes, with overload capacity up to 35 amperes, I fail to see why it should not work satisfactorily.

"As you will notice by my letter head, I believe in attention to details and I should very much like to know why you think that extra resistance (other than that of the lamp) is necessary. If introducing it will improve my light, I am very anxious to try it, but, at present, I fail to see how it can have any other effect than to waste a part of the D. C. in heating a useless rheostat with consequent diminution of light. I have made a somewhat lengthy study of the electrical end of the M. P. business, but this is a new one on me; more especially as I have tried the same outfit (as to D. C. output) in several places in England, and have invariably gotten satisfactory results.

"I don't think that I am less particular than others as to picture, light, etc. In fact I have been complimented by innumerable people on the 'splendid, clear, white light' which they say is better than any in Denver."

Well, Leadville, you say the idea that resistance is necessary with a projection arc is a new one on you. My dear boy, if you are successfully handling one, connected to an ordinary generator, without resistance, you have a new one on the Editor, for this reason: The resistance of an arc varies with the flow of current and the length of the arc. As the current flow increases or the arc is shortened the resistance decreases, and vice versa. Now you will grant that the keeping of arc length absolutely the same is impossible with a hand-fed lamp. All right! The instant the arc length changes the resistance changes. Suppose you are pulling 35 amperes with an arc ¼ inch in length. You shorten the length a trifle. Instantly the amperage, meeting less resistance, is increased and, by the increased flow, the resistance is still further decreased. The practical effect being that there will be a rush of current up to the point where something happens. That is the accepted theory by electricians. Personally I have never tried an arc without resistance, except with a specially constructed generator made to automatically govern the flow of current. I have never before heard of any one who even claimed to handle a projection arc under those conditions. I shall be glad to hear the views of our readers on this proposition. I understand Leadville used a plain 50-volt D. C. generator, not a special machine. If Leadville is right then I guess we all have something to learn yet.

Interesting Letter.—Chicago contributes the following: "May I call attention to a point which seems to have escaped the notice of machine manufacturers, operators, and others who set up machines? It may explain a few things which have seemed inexplicable, particularly in moving picture projection. You know what Bausch & Lomb say in their booklet on 'Projection Lenses,' that the condenser should, for best results, project an image of the light source which is formed at the diaphragm of the objective. Now, the point to which I wish to call attention is, that the diaphragms of both moving pictures and stereopticon objectives should be at the same distance from the condensers. Perhaps this fact is so obvious as to make my calling it to notice superfluous, but I have seen quite a few machines in this city where one or the other lens was from one or two inches to ten or twelve inches nearer to the condensers than its mate. The result, almost invariably, is that one picture is bad, while the other may be good. In particular, I noticed one case where the throw was long, 110 feet or so, and the lenses of very long focus. The streo lens was held in an extension tube and was almost a foot farther away from the lamp than its mate. The moving picture was very poor. The stereo picture was of ordinary brightness, without any ghost, while the moving picture had a bad ghost in the center. Your old remedy to remove a ghost by pulling the lamp house back would have been the proper thing to do in this case. The operator at this house, to save himself the trouble of frequent setting of his carbons, was using ¾ inch carbons, with a rated current of 45 amperes through a transformer—certainly not a combination to insure a good light. It seems strange to me that operators have never realized what an infallible guide to correct light adjustment they have had alongside of their machine in the stereo attachment. If the machine baseboard is of the proper length to allow of both lenses being the same distance from the condensers, obviously if the light is correctly adjusted for one lens it will be correct for the other also.

"It may be that operators have not noticed the possibility of the stereo lens serving them as a guide in getting a light, because many of them have perhaps worked where conditions were nearly correct, and got into the habit of judging the light from the appearance of the spot at the cooling plate. I know that many operators do first center their light before starting a show, using the stereopticon, but it does not always lead to the best results. If conditions are right, I should think that the spot would look about the same whether a 3-inch or a 10-inch e. f. lens were in use, but when the 10-inch lens is used with a condenser-to-machine distance suited to a lens of much shorter focus, a ghost would be inevitable, because the rays cross before reaching the objective, and are diverging when they strike the back combination. This naturally brings up the question also of the focal length of the condenser. After considerable thought on this subject, I have come to the conclusion that there is really little difference what focus lens is employed, especially with the stereo. In fact, I have a notion that the short focus condenser would give a shade the brighter image, because it is nearer to the source of light. But the short focus condenser would project too large an image of the arc to be contained in the diaphragm of the objective, unless one of large diameter were used. In the case of the moving picture, the spot would be too large, and much light would be wasted. Professor Gage's article was very interesting to me. It never occurred to me that the lead wires could have any effect on the arc, though I knew it could be deflected by a magnetic field. Perhaps this explains why some operators have fair success with the horizontal "V" setting for alternating current, the carbons themselves having enough field to push the arc out to the ends of the carbons. Also, Professor Gage's note about spherical aberration in the condenser is pertinent. But if this is the real source of a ghost, changing condensers ought to remove it, since it is possible that another set of condensers may be comparatively free from this defect. But I would suggest that the troubled operator first look to his equipment and see whether his machine is the right distance from his lamp. The Professor's remarks as to the intensity of the light on the picture are very interesting. Personally, I prefer just as bright a picture as it is possible to get. It has been my experience that the brighter the picture the more stereoscopic it has been. Of course, with a very powerful light, flicker becomes troublesome, especially with a two-wing shutter, while even a three-wing shutter will have a trace of it if the speed be dropped a trifle. As to the necessity for maintaining the same degree of luminosity, regardless of the size of the image: outside of its being practically impossible, it is unnecessary, because the larger image will require less light for one to see it clearly. To use a simple example, as every one knows, a large type can be read in a dim light, when a small type is illegible; also, in a faint light one is always tempted to hold reading matter or other objects close to the eyes in order to see them distinctly—in effect making them larger.

"Speaking about large images, I think that the picture which Lyman H. Howe is projecting at the Garrick Theater here is about the largest ever shown in Chicago as a regular thing. I should say that its dimensions are something like 24 by 35 feet, and yet the light is even, bright, and well handled. Of course, with such a large picture, there is little possibility of there being any sunshine in it, but Mr. Howe's operator certainly puts daylight, at least, into it. One never sees a shadow, jump, misframe or anything like that at Mr. Howe's shows, and that partly accounts for their popularity. In 'giving the public what it wants' Mr. Howe includes perfect projection among other things.

"I had a long article prepared on the action of lenses, which I intended to send you, but the starting of your series of light lessons deterred me. Would you care to have it? It might be of some slight service to you in preparing your own article, and I will send it right along, if you wish.

"I want to say one thing about condensers. The optical center of the plano-convex lens seems to be open to discussion, as some books give it as the middle point of the curved face, while others say it is the middle point of the plane face. My high school physics text book, however, says it is the middle point of the convex surface, so I guess that is right. Therefore, in measuring a condenser, the distance from image to this point is the one to take. A better, but not very convenient way to measure a lens, is to focus an object on a screen until the size of the screen image is the same as that of the object. Measure the distance from screen to object, and divide by four; the result is the equivalent focus of the lens. This plan works with any lens, since no measurement is made to the lens itself. The distance from lens to screen is called the secondary focus of the lens."

Your letter, Chicago, is of much interest. It shows thought and study. What the Bausch & Lomb booklet says is probably correct, but it must be remembered that ordinarily the size of the picture, as well as the throw, is fixed by conditions beyond the operator's control. Therefore, he is compelled to use lenses to fit conditions. In the combination outfit the focal length of the condenser is almost invariably a compromise between the requirements of the stero lens of comparatively long focal length and those of the M. P. objective of much less length. Occasionally it is practical to set both lenses so that the source of light will focus at the diaphragm (E. F. point) of both lenses. Take, for example, an instance such as this: the throw is 110 feet. The manager wants a 10 foot picture, both stero and moving. There will be a 7-inch E. F. M. P. lens required and a 22-inch stero. This means that the diaphragm of the stero will set that distance from the slide, while the diaphragm of the M. P. lens will set 7 inches from the film. Subtracting 7 inches from 22 we find it would be necessary to set the condenser 15 inches from the aperture to have diaphragm of both lenses equidistant from condenser. This is not impossible, true, but there are much more extreme cases than this. On very short focal length lens it would require bringing the lamphouse very close to the machine, which is inconvenient and undesirable. The correct method is, beyond question, to have condensers to fit each lens. In a combination machine this, however, is manifestly impractical. In many houses it is necessary to have the stero and M. P. the same height. This condition compels a stero lens of extremely long focal length as compared to the length in cases where the width of the pictures only is the same. In fact, the conditions vary so widely that no rule can possibly be laid down for all cases where a combination machine is used. Nevertheless, your remarks on the subject have value, since they induce study of the matter as a whole. Discussion of this and similar topics is always welcomed. By all means send in the article on lenses. Even though not available for publication, on account of the lessons on light, it will be thankfully received. There are probably few who realize the immense amount of research and labor involved in the Lessons on Light. There is a-plenty written on lenses and light, but getting it into simple form, that the ordinary man can understand, is a real task; also in the matter of lenses and light as applied to projection I am compelled very largely to construct an absolutely new work, since, so far as I am able to discover, the subject has never been treated in practical form. If I succeed I shall feel amply repaid.

Personally, I am still very much in doubt as to the magnetic action, as set forth by Mr. Hallberg and Prof. Gage, being of practical value in controlling the arc. Granted, it exists, it is, I am certain, altogether too weak to be utilized with any degree of certainty in results. Your remarks concerning less need for brilliancy in a large picture than in the smaller one, are correct. However, that merely emphasizes the impracticability of establishing a standard of brilliancy as suggested by Professor Gage. Mr. Lyman Howe demands results from his operators. Crudeness is not tolerated, nor are errors condoned. I regard the fact that a man has served Mr. Howe for any length of time, as an operator, as conclusive proof of his ability to deliver the goods under any and all conditions. I believe there is no doubt but that the optical center of a plano-convex lens is at a point between its two surfaces, its exact location dependent on the refractive index of the glass.

Examination Questions.—Canton, Ohio, writes: "Had a talk with one of our city officials in regard to ordinance governing operation of motion picture apparatus and its connections. Not being able to supply him with the proper information, I appeal to you for aid along that line. What do you regard as proper questions for examination, and, in this case, do you think the San Francisco ordinance, published recently in the Department (July 17 issue) is all right to hand them for use as a guide? Also how about the article ('An Act,' June 24 issue?) I note that the good old paper is growing; also the Department. I look for it Monday morning, for well I know it will contain things worth reading. I wish to thank yourself and the contributors for the help I have received through the Department. I have discovered a new shade for incandescent lamps. It enables one to show brilliant pictures in a well lighted house. Will inform you of name, catalogue number and where they may be had just as soon as I find out myself. Have tried many shades, but without success until I struck these. They give a soft, white light and do not dazzle the eyes of the audience."

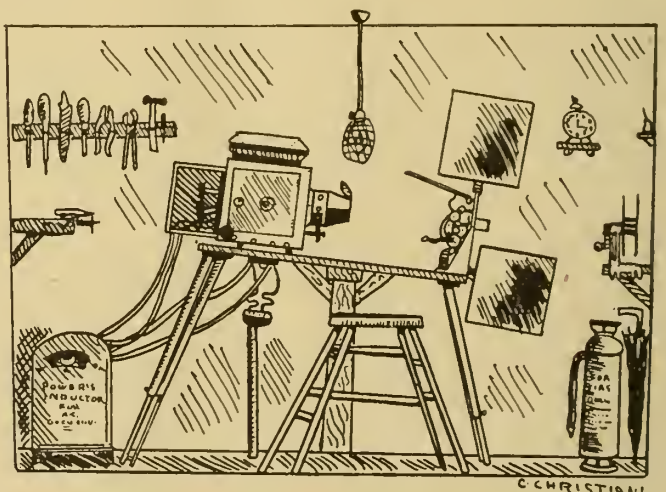
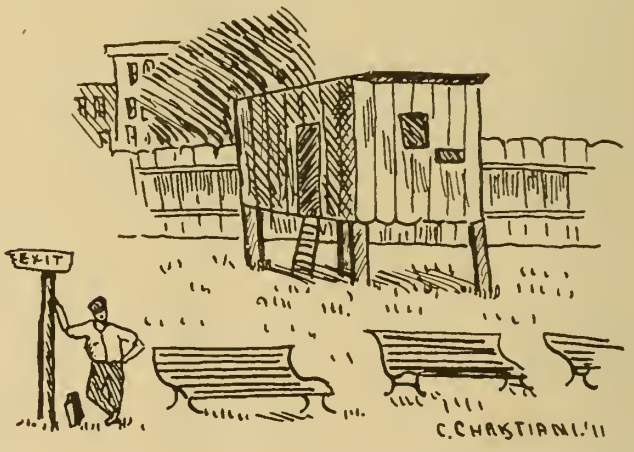
Glad to publish information as to shades as soon as received. As to the ordinances mentioned, the first named will serve as an excellent guide in framing an ordinance. The last named covers one point, but that point is an excellent one, if strengthened by a clause prohibiting an apprentice from handling the machine except when the operator is personally present in the booth. As to questions for examinations: I very much doubt the advisability of publishing such a list. I fear it would enable men without adequate experience to learn the answers to certain questions. Under such conditions an examination would be a farce. A set routine of examination questions is most decidedly not good, since very soon the full list would become known and then—you know what would happen. As a matter-of-fact, comparatively few questions, if they be right ones, will fully determine an applicant's competency. Here are samples: What is the shutter for? How is it set? Why has it more than one blade? An outside shutter with three wings of practically equal size is used on some machines. Why could not a shutter having three wings of practically equal width be used inside, close to the aperture? What is the intermittent movement and what does it do? What is the lock of the Geneva movement? How many times does the Geneva movement act to each foot of film? How many complete revolutions does the intermittent sprocket make to each turn of the crank? How wide is a film—how thick? How many pictures to the foot—how many sprocket-holes to the picture? If your picture moves up and down on the screen four times to each turn of the crank what does it indicate? How should your idler rollers be set? If your film is in good condition and you keep losing your lower loop what would you look for? What are the tension springs for? How would you determine whether or not your springs give the right amount of tension? What is the effect of too little tension? Of too much? What effect is worn aperture plate tracks likely to produce? How tight ought your take-up tension to be? What effect will too heavy take-up tension have? How do you find the required focal length of a moving picture objective lens to project a certain size picture? How find the same thing for a stero lens? Explain why stero lens focal length is much greater for a given size picture, at same distance, than the M. P. lens. What is the difference between back and equivalent focus? Suppose you were on the road and broke the only stero lens you had. How would you project a stereo picture? Could you use a 2-inch E. F. motion picture lens in all machines? In running first run films what difficulty is likely to be encountered? Will any good film cement patch all kinds of film? If you are projecting a scene with persons walking, how fast would you run it? What general effect has the speed you run the machine on the projection? What ought always to govern your speed? What is 'normal' speed, and why is it normal? When a figure moves rapidly across the screen it frequently shows jerky motion—why? What are the condensers for? What kind of lens is a condenser lens? About how far will the arc ordinarily be from the condenser? What is a crater? How ought it to set? Why is greater amperage necessay, for a given curtain brilliancy with alternating current than with direct current? What is A. C.? What is D. C.? What is polarity? Which is the negative wire with A. C.? Why attach the positive wire to the upper carbon arm with D. C.? Explain why you would have poor light if positive wire is attached to lower carbon arm and negative to upper, with D. C.? What adjustments has the projection arc lamp? What do you understand by amperage—voltage—resistance? How would you figure the horsepower of your arc? How find the number of watts your lamp is consuming? How would you measure an asbestos covered, stranded wire? How would you clean your lenses? How would you line your machine from arc to front end of objective lens? What are the two loops in the film for? What becomes of the carbons? Why is it important that the vents of the lamphouse hood be kept clean and free? What is likely to happen if they get clogged up? What is the white ash which collects on the inner lamphouse wall? What is a voltmeter? An ammeter? We are pulling 40 amperes from a 110 volt line through a rheostat; arc voltage 50. What is the resistance, in ohms, of the rheostat? Is that all the resistance the current encounters? What will be the effect in current consumption if we freeze the carbons, and why? What is the difference in a 110 volt and a 220 volt switch? Could you use a 110 volt switch on 220 volts? Could you use a 220 volt switch on 110 volts? What is a fuse for? What is a fuse? How does it act? What is an enclosed fuse? A link fuse? A plug fuse? What size wire would you need for 45 amperes? Why that size? What would be the effect if a No. 14 were used? Why is copper used for electric wires? Why not use iron? Suppose you were sent out to a country town to give a show in a church and found the wires entering were No. 14, what would you do? Suppose they were 000 wires, what would you do? Suppose it was 220 volt current and you had but one 110 volt rheostat along, what would you do? Suppose there was a meter of 12 amperes capacity, what would you do? Suppose it was A. C. and the transformer on the pole had only a secondary capacity of 1,300 watts, what would you do? How would you find the voltage? What is an "Economizer," "Inductor," etc., and how do they act?

And so I might go on multiplying questions indefinitely, but space and time forbids.

Artist-Operator.—From Courtland, Christiani, Washington, D. C., comes the following: "I don't trouble you often, but notice you have, recently, published a number of operating room photos. Perhaps you may be interested in a pen and ink sketch of one, particularly when the 'artist' is also the operator.



There is nothing remarkable about the booth but, considering its small size, I try to keep everything ship-shape, so far as posible.



The scene is laid in Schuetzen Park Airdome, Georgia Avenue and Kenyon Street, this city."

My dear Mr. Christiani, our cartoonist, Mr. Hoffman, positively turned a bright pea-green from pure envy when I showed him those classy sketches. But I must take you to task for using the term "booth." In the parlance of the street, "cut it out!". Operating-Room is the word. Talking of "booths" and "coops" has the tendency to fix the idea of the iron-lined cracker-box operating room in the manager's mind. We want a room, not a booth or a coop. That tool rack pleased me very much; also the vise. Every operator should have at least one vise. Some, however, run to excess and have several. You have tools and they are apparently kept in order in a proper rack—good! In the scene, presuming the gentleman holding up the exit post to be yourself, I note absence of a cigarette—again, good! But, joking aside, the sketches are excellent and reflect distinct credit on the artist.

Synchronism.—Portland, Ore., writes: "Am running a Pathe machine, three-wing, outside shutter. I observe that, when running the machine without film, at slow rate of speed, there is decided flicker. As speed increases the flicker becomes less, gradually passing into a slow wave. As the speed is still further increased the wave again runs into a pronounced flicker. Have A. C., through a Formastat. Have also observed the same effect with Powers No. 6 machine when used on A. C., but am told it does not occur when D. C. is used. If you can give me any information concerning this I shall indeed be thankful."

The trouble lies in the fact that your shutter gets into synchronism with one side of the alternations. A two wing shutter is the solution. It will occur only at above normal speed if the cycle is 60. At 80 turns of the crank per minute your shutter is revolving at the rate of 1,280 times per minute, and the light is interrupted (by three blades) 3,840 times. Sixty cycle current alternates 7,200 times per second. Half that is 3,600. You will therefore see that the light interruptions and one side of the alternations come pretty close together. The effect begins before the point of absolute synchronism is reached. You must understand that 120 times per second the alternating current arc is practically, if not entirely, without voltage. The voltage rises from nothing to 110 and back to nothing each alternation. At the low point there is very little light. Your shutter wings interrupt the light, at a certain speed, when the voltage is at its height, leaving the light on the screen only while the arc voltage is at zero. With a two-wing shutter this effect will disappear, but the flicker will be much more pronounced. Recognizing this condition, the Powers people furnish a two-wing outside shutter for use with 60 cycle current, when requested. Whether or not the Pathe Company do I cannot say.

Herbst Process.—Sheridan, Wyo., writes: "Are the attachments put out by R. H. Herbst, Bright Light Picture a success and would you recommend using it? Would you recommend use of Mercury Arc Rectifier to change A. C. to D. C.? Would it give me better light and picture? Am building new theater and want to get the best."

Have seen demonstration showing most excellent results by the Herbst (now the Pat Casey) process. Whether it would give you same results would depend on how you handled it. Mercury Arc rectifier is giving general satisfaction. It is thoroughly practical. D. C. is much the best for projection. To get really good light from A. C. you will have to use from 50 to 75 amperes. Much less D. C. amperage gives better results and is easier to handle.

Several Questions.—Youngstown, O., writes: "What causes the wires to burn off at the lamp? What would happen if No. 14 wires were used? Why is it that a film has to be put in the machine upside down? What causes the condensers to break? Would like to get book of instructions for operators."

Copper oxidizes under the action of heat. The effect is somewhat similar to rusting of iron. As the oxidization proceeds the wire loses its conductivity. Its resistance becomes higher until finally it becomes sufficient to heat the wires to the burning point. If a No. 14 wire were used there would be excessive heating, high resistance and choking of the current. Study the light lessons in this department for explanation of why film is run upside down. Condensers crack because they are thin at the edge and thick in the center, therefore they cool unevenly and it follows that expansion and contraction is unequal. Avoid sudden changes of temperature in the lamp house. That will help, but, regardless of what you may do, condensers will probably break occasionally. Send in $1.50 and we will supply you with a complete operator's and manager's handbook.

Side Motion.—St. Louis, Mo., writes, ordering a handbook, and asks: "How can I take the side motion out of picture; Edison machine?"

If there is side motion in intermittent sprocket, loosen the set-screws holding the bushings in which the intermittent sprocket-shaft runs and shove the bushings against the shoulder on the shaft, retightening set-screws, of course. In doing this be sure to keep the sprocket teeth central with tracks on aperture plates. See to it that the guide at top of gate hugs the film reasonably close, but not close enough to in any way bind it. If the picture sways once to every turn of the crank, your machine moves sidewise, the table not being properly anchored.

New Ideas.—Mr. R. L. Strong, operator, Poinciana Theater, Tampa, Fla., writes: "As daylight pictures are the next step in advance for the up-to-date house we have adopted the idea in the Poinciana. We run with five double windows on each side open, but no direct rays reach the screen. Probably it will be interesting to those working to perfect daylight projection to know that I obtain excellent results with 104 volts—A. C., through Fort Wayne Compensarc, tests showing 35 amperes from the 40-ampere notch. The results are perfect. My machine is a Motiograph, 1911 model, to which I have added an invention of my own which eliminates all flicker. I have the advertised daylight processes skinned by a mile, taking examples I viewed in Chicago for comparison. I am working on three other ideas I hope to have perfected soon. Both myself and the manager have gotten any number of splendid ideas from The World."

Shall be glad to know details of your inventions, Neighbor Strong, as soon as you are ready to place them before the readers of the Department. Trust they will be all you hope and that you will reap much glory and financial reward therefrom.

Film Stock Fault.—Oklahoma (name of town suppressed) writes: "I enclose three pieces of film from the Vitagraph picture 'The Sleep Walker.' Can you inform me as to why this blue-tinted film will split and then break enough to misframe the picture when going through the machine? So far as I can determine the machine (Edison, Model B) is in good shape. The film was split in this one scene. Is it poor stock or is the emulsion too sticky? Am projecting a 14½-foot picture 65 feet 110 volt, 60 cycle current, through Ft. Wayne compensarc, using second notch. Get good light. Current here, however, is poor and have to use Columbia flat-side carbons to hold the arc next condenser. Will third notch of compensarc do if I throw 30 feet further? Will it do if I throw 30 feet further, and five feet wider picture? Third notch makes carbons noisy and burns up the lamp wires; also it is hard to hold the arc and it flutters too much and carbons burn to pencil point. What is best to do in case length of building is increased as above? Have used the third notch in other houses, but could not maintain clear, steady light with it. Curtain is muslin coated with blue tinted alabastine."

Have carefully examined samples of film, also submitted them to the Vitagraph Company. Cannot find anything wrong with film itself, but the sprocket-holes have been very badly strained. In fact, one side of most of them has been bent down by the sprocket teeth and has cracked on either side of the tooth. Film is new and shows no signs of emulsion on tension springs; emulsion on springs usually shows scratch line down sprocket holes. Very, very heavy tension is the only thing I can suggest. Probably, however, the damage was done before you received the film. Naturally when sprocket teeth reached those ripped holes the film would drop back (up) by just that amount; practically half the distance between sprocket holes. This would throw picture out of frame at the top. Not all holes are thus ripped, however, so that probably picture would soon jump back into frame if left alone. This is all that appears from examination of the film. It is not N. I. stock. I don't exactly know what you may mean by the film "splitting." Plainly you have not made much study of handling A C projection arc. Would suggest you procure handbook immediately. If you already have one would recommend close study of same. The added 35 feet of throw will not diminish your illumination on the screen, but increasing width of picture most decidedly will. Would suggest that you look back through Trouble Department of past six months and find receipts for coating screens with aluminum. There are three of them, I believe. Coat your screen according to directions there given and you will be able to project picture five foot wider, having brilliancy equal to present picture, with same amperage now used. Use No. 6 lampleads.

Camera Man.—Lincoln, Neb., writes: "Am much interested in Projection Department. Can you inform me as to proper procedure to secure position as M. P. camera man? Have been operating five years and am still at it. Would like to go where can have more chance at fresh air."

Presumably you are a good operator, Lincoln, but you say nothing about your knowledge of photography, or your ability as a camera man. Would suggest you write the various companies, offering your services. Also, provided you feel competent to deliver the goods, you might land something through an "ad" in the World. Take say a three-line, or a four line space for a month.

Film Jumps.—Grand Junction, Col., writes: "Have Edison, Type B machine, 65-foot throw, 110 volt A C, 60 amperes. Picture is not steady on the screen. Have new tension springs and aperture plate. Star is set up tight against cam. Can't locate cause of jump. Am using independent service."

See to it that your lens is tight in its jacket, also that your machine itself sits rigid and steady and tension springs tight enough. Probably the jump is due to unevenness in perforation of films. Do some makes jump more than others? Try to get hold of a Pathe film, in good condition. If it jumps the fault is in the machine. If it does not the trouble is in the films. If the Pathe jumps, write again describing the movement very carefully. Too many correspondents simply write saying "my film jumps." Describing the movement minutely helps me greatly in locating the trouble. For instance, if the movement is up and down four times to each turn of the crank it means one of two things. If it is uneven in time, slight, and a trifle up and down sometimes and a trifle sidewise other times it means quite another thing. Therefore be very careful and minute in describing film jump, if you want my best service in locating the trouble.

Bunch of Questions.—New York City writes: "(1) Is the cam pin of a Powers five soldered in or riveted? If it gets loose can it be fixed without putting in a new cam? (2) How do you remove the spindle on which the takeup reel rests? (3)Does it do any good to take apart the adjusting nut and spring on the takeup and wash it? (4) If you wish to increase the tension on takeup how do you do it? (5)Which is the best way to measure asbestos covered wire? (6) If you use two machines and two lamps must you have separate cutouts for each lamp, also separate meters, or can you pull from the same mains?

(1) It is riveted. You should put in a new pin. Better take machine to the factory and have it done right, if you are in New York City. (2) Remove compression nut and spring. Loosen collar on spindle inside magazine and you can then slip spindle out. (3) If you mean wash the nut and spring, no. (4) Tighten up on the adjustment screw. (5) Measure diameter of one strand, with micrometer calliper, in thousandths of an inch. Multiply the diameter, in thousandths, by itself, which gives the cross section in circular mills. Count the strands, multiply circular mills of one strand by number of strands and find corresponding solid wire cross-section in some one of the many published tables. That will be size of the wire. (6) You must have separate switches and either separate resistance, or resistance so wired as to cut out of one circuit and into the other. You can use the same meter and mains, however. Have you a New York card? ? ?

The operating room of the Bijou Theater in Springfield, Mass., is one of the most carefully and strongly constructed in the country. It is made of asbestos boards and angle irons, and is eight feet wide, twelve feet long and seven feet high. The inspectors for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts have pronounced it to be absolutely fire-proof, and to contain the best equipment they have ever observed. The motion picture machine is the best obtainable, and the remaining apparatus of an equally high grade. An Edison Kinetoscope and Powers Cameragraph are the machines used. The Edison is used for the moving pictures, and the Powers as an extra machine. A dissolving stereopticon is used for the illustrated songs. There are two spot-lights, and the house lights are controlled from the booth by switches and a dimmer. There are five machines in all in the room, which is in the rear of the balcony. Two are in use all the time. There are automatic shutters on all openings, which close in case of fire. Henry Schoch is chief operator; Frank Blanchand, second operator, and Cesar Scalwini, assistant.

Coronation Pictures in Chicago

Britain's Great Ceremonial Function Presented in Classic Form by Lyman H. Howe, and Favorably Received.

The motiograph portrayal of England's great coronation as produced by the Lyman H. Howe Company, was shown for the first time in this city Tuesday afternoon, July 11th, at the Garrick Theater. The weather was anything but conducive to a paying attendance, but the Randolph Street playhouse on this occasion suggested the crowded boxes that lined the thoroughfares of London itself during the actual performance of the great pageant.

From a photographic standpoint the pictures may well be termed good, for they are remarkably clear and excellent in detail, but there is no doubt that the American public will be somewhat disappointed in the lack of exciting events; for, aside from the parade itself and the presentation of the pearl sword to the King at Temple Bar, there is nothing to create unusual interest, and one might almost imagine himself viewing the parade of a Knight Templars' conclave, rather than the great and glorious coronation of the greatest monarch of the world.

However, such was the coronation, and the Howe production is good and will undoubtedly continue to draw the crowds. The arrangement of the scenes could not be improved upon, and to spice the otherwise monotonous array of soldiery and carriages, pictures such as the "Naval Review at Spithead," "The U. S. S. Delaware, America's Naval Representative," and "Fancy Drills of the School Children" are shown.

Following is the manner in which the coronation is presented:

(a) Various views of the Coronation Procession at the New Admiralty Arch and approaching Westminster Abbey (June 22).
(b) Peers and Peeresses going to the ceremonies in Thames River steamers to avoid the crowds.
(c) The Procession after the ceremonies, proceeding to Buckingham Palace.
(d) Arrival at Buckingham Palace.
(e) Naval review at Spithead (June 24). Photographed from the Chilian battleship "Chacabuco." Close views of the royal yacht "Victoria and Albert," also U. S. S. "Delaware," America's naval representative.
(f) Reception at the Guild Hall (June 29). Close facial portraits of King George, Queen Mary, Prince of Wales, Princess Mary, Lord Mayor of London, Duke of Connaught (Canada's next Governor General), U. S. Ambassador, etc., etc.
(g) Lord Kitchener mounting his horse.
(h) Lord Mayor of London presenting the pearl sword to the King at Temple Bar, London's western boundary, during the "Royal Progress." (This ceremony has no parallel throughout the world). When the King reached this point he found the Lord Mayor on foot in attendance. The Chief Magistrate advanced, hearing the "Pearl Sword of the City," and, lowering the point, congratulates His Majesty on his coming to his city of London. The Lord Mayor presented the sword to the King, who touched the hilt and returned the sword, saying that it could not be in better hands.
(i) The good-natured crowds at 8.30 p. m. (June 29).
(j) Snapshots of some of the illuminations in the heart of London.
(k) Display of fireworks that closed with electrical portraits of the King and Queen.

The interest of the Press has been aroused to such an extent that the leading dailies of Chicago have devoted columns to the review and criticism of the pictures, Ashton Stevens, of the Examiner, ending a brilliant column entitled, "The Canning of a King," wrote: "But just the same, it was the most interesting set of films that I have ever seen unrolled. It was history hot from the grid—history that will keep in its can till the oldest Sequoia is dead and the topmast tip of the Himalayas has lost its point." The Record-Herald said of the pictures: "They are full of life and interest, and some of them are remarkably clear. All are intensely interesting and they will repay a visit to the Randolph Street playhouse."

PENNSYLVANIA EXHIBITORS ACTIVE.

The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Pennsylvania held its first annual convention on Sunday, July 16, at Pittsburg, Pa., and elected two delegates to attend the National convention at Cleveland, Ohio. Other exhibitors who desire to attend the convention are requested to send their names to the secretary, Harry McGowan, Pittsburg, Pa., as soon as possible so that arrangements for their transportation can be made.

Attention of exhibitors in the Pittsburg District is called to the fact that the Pennsylvania League will run an excursion to Myers Lake, Canton, Ohio, on Sunday, July 30th. The round trip fare is $1.50; tickets can be obtained at League Headquarters, 233 Fifth Avenue, Pittsburg.

All members are requested to make a special effort to attend the meeting of the League on Sunday, July 23rd, at 2 o'clock p. m., as business of great importance will be considered.

Comments on the Films

Licensed.

"S. S. Olympic" (Pathe).—This short film pictures a big ship, and shows how the great trans-Atlantic liners are worked into their docks in New York harbor.

"Reckless Reddy Reforms" (Kalem).—This Western comedy tells the story of a girl who worked a complete transformation in a cowboy, causing him to give up drinking and cigarettes. When the boys trail Reddy they discover the reason and are just in time to see them married by the justice, after which they go to their new home. The boys push a box under the window. From it the bride takes a cigar which she gives to Reddy, at the same time declaring that he is fully reformed.

"The Snare of Society" (Lubin).—Here is a story which is supposed to represent the dangers of too much whist. The wife has received a ring from her husband. Beaten at play it becomes necessary for her to have a large sum of money. Failing to find as much as she needed in her husband's safe, she pledges her ring. The husband sees the ring. The wife goes to get it back, and the man who holds it makes a proposition that they cut the cards. If he wins he will give the ring. If he wins he has her. She wins and grabbing the ring she hurries home, where she tells the whole story. It is, of course, well acted.

"It Happened in the West" (Selig).—The situation pictured in this film is far from new, but this reviewer can not remember seeing it so intelligently conducted as by the Selig Company. The English gentleman who has taken a squaw and has a son by her is notified that he is now a baronette and that a white wife is waiting for him. The half-breed son grows up in England and suffers because of his tainted blood. The last scene shows him, a young man, with other Indians, his kindred, paying a visit to his mother's grave. The picture is dignified, human and instructive, though it hardly can be called an important one.

Scene from "The Profligate" (Selig).

"Father and Son" (Pathe).—Here is a domestic drama showing first the death of a wife and mother. Later the father becomes a burglar because of his infatuation for a woman. The son discovers him at his work, takes his place and is arrested. At the police station the matter is explained and the father and son are reconciled to each other.

"Bobbie the Coward" (Biograph).—Melodrama takes place after true drama chiefly because it aims to give a thrill rather than an edifying emotion. This more than ordinarily interesting Biograph picture uses the melodrama's privilege of playing to the gallery only in one scene, its climax, in which the hero, a rather slight lad, disposes of two burly gangsters who are armed. From the gallery's viewpoint and from the moralist's immediate viewpoint, this is a virtue. Aside from this, the picture is true enough to life to be instructive. It's a story of the slums and it is dramatic enough to be sure of success even if put on the stage in the old way. While not absolutely realistic, it shows far more truth than would be possible in a theater. It is as human as it is well acted. The boy is a physical coward because he has nothing in his stomach; but even then he is brave enough to return the lady's lost pocketbook. He gets a reward and a job too. The gangsters see the money and trail him home. Fortunately, they do not make the attempt to steal the money till he has had a good dinner and he knocks them down and ties them. The acting is remarkable, especially that of the girl who plays his little sister. Real street scenes with slum crowds passing unconsciously were used as background; nothing could be more realistic. The incident when the lady visiting the slums asks a little girl what she is going to put in the tin pail is delightful. Taking it as it comes, it is the most interesting picture this reveiwer has seen since the patriotic releases just before the Fourth.

"In the Right of Way" (Melies).—This picture, though interesting, is not so convincing as some of the recent Melies pictures. One of its faults is that its first scenes suggest another kind of ending. We've often seen the husband of a happy family bring home a wounded stranger and expected to see this one grow jealous like the others. Because of these other trite plays it was natural for us to expect it, and the expectation kept us from understanding the situation. One of the worst banes of art is the labor necessary to keep any work clean of suggestions that lead the mind away from the right path. These suggestions are hidden everywhere, and they've made many a lesser poet ridiculous. The sharp gun-fight between the man, grown old, and the engineers of the railroad, while possible, is hardly convincing. A man would have needed to sleep and the engineers should have tried other means than a daylight, direct attack. The fact that he was protecting his wife's grave from being desecrated by the new railroad is the play's strong point; it saves the picture.

"The Minute Man" (Edison).—This is the second film picturing the British march from Boston to Lexington and of the two this is easily the better. One wishes he could commend it wholly. If it had been only a bit more realistic, it would have been wonderful. Some of it is wonderful, but not the repulse at the bridge. There was no cause for panic as shown. Those troops needed more than that to frighten them. The British soldiers should have been met with a much larger and wider volume of smoke and the panic should, perhaps, have overcome them, as a whole, more suddenly. This was the place to pile up the corpses rather than along the road. At the rate they fell there, there wouldn't have been any left. The picture awakens deep emotions and is effective.

"The Corporation and the Ranch Girl" (Essanay).—To this reviewer, this picture seems the least convincing of all the Essanay pictures he has seen. In the first place, the photography is so poor that the pictures hardly have the usual amount of life. This was very noticeable in the scene where the girl reads the letter held unconsciously out of the window. The story is itself weak. What railroad president would make such a proposition to his son—to make love to a girl to induce her to sell a ranch? The scene in the club showed men around the table, but their parts suggested boys—undergraduates. It's surely a weak picture.

"Snowbound with a Woman Hater" (Vitagraph).—This exceedingly amusing picture is full of comedy spirit of the best Vitagraph kind. Julia Swayne could hardly have a more charming part, nor play it better than she plays this young girl caught in the blizzard and forced to ask for shelter at the first house, the woman hater's. She played it as a young woman who was very sure of herself, yet very prettily. There was true humor in the breakfast scenes; there was more in the luncheon scene, and the dinner scene was best of all, though the scene in the kitchen was also very amusing. It is a well conducted play from first to last and one that should greatly please cultivated audiences.

"The Rosary" (Essanay).—This deeply religious film pictures the sacrifice made by two young people who dearly love each other, on account of religion. The acting is strong and well sustained, each of the principal characters interpreting his or her part admirably. The film is certain to make a deep impression since its subject is unusual and the actors perform their parts sympathetically.

"The Backwoodsman's Suspicion" (Essanay).—This pictures a Western story of needless jealousy, and has a narrowly averted tragedy at its close. The tale is of a young author going West for his health and finding board with a backwoodsman. Finding the young wife illiterate the author undertakes to teach her to read. This rouses the jealousy of the husband. The author receives a telegram to come home. To go the long way would mean missing his train, so the woman volunteers to pilot him a shorter, but more dangerous way. The husband returns during her absence and suspecting they have eloped starts after them. The wife returns soon afterward and learning of the state of affairs starts again on a wild ride to avert a tragedy, which, happily, she accomplishes, reaching the station before anything serious happens. All is then explained and the trouble ceases.

"Good for Evil" (Lubin).—Duplicity in a love affair is the principal motive of this Western film. Two pals love the same girl. One is called home, but before he goes he places the ring on the girl's finger. He falls sick with fever and the doctor tells him he will die. He sends two letters, one to his pal and one to the girl. The pal gets both, reads his own, destroys the one to the girl. She believes the man false and marries the pal. He does not die, however, and as soon as he is well decides to go back and surprise her. He arrives just after she is married. Her father informs him that the best thing he can do is to leave the place. So he wanders away into the desert. The father meets the pal and upbraids him for his duplicity. The young wife hears it and tells him plainly that she cannot love a man who has done such a dastardly deed and commands him to go look the other man up. He is found in the desert nearly dead. By giving him all the water he has the pal restores him sufficiently to get him back, but is overcome in the attempt and dies himself. The stricken one is found barely alive and taken back. The death of her husband leaving the woman free, she straightway marries her first love.

"Subduing Mrs. Nag" (Vitagraph).—This comic character picture gives the two leading character players, "Bunny" and Miss Finch, of the Vitagraph Company, a splendid chance to show how much can be pictured, almost told, by facial expression, and the amount of characterization that they accomplish is remarkable. But between little Miss Prue, the stenographer to whom Mrs. Nag objects and the prim Miss Prue, of next day, the supposedly new stenographer, there is such an amusing difference that it alone is worth while seeing. These character plays of the Vitagraph Company are all good. This is better than the average; but they are not to be compared with the real comedies that this company produces every now and then.

"The Tenderfoot's Claim" (Kalem).—This picture is well photographed, perfectly constructed and well acted; but the story behind it is not of great significance. A sharper attempts to jump the claim of four miners and fails. The tenderfoot appears and the miners make fun of him and "salt" his claim with brass filings. The sharper happens to pass and overhears his joyous shouts that he has struck it rich. The tenderfoot gets sick and the miners, repenting of having played the trick on him, put real gold dust in his glass jar without his knowing. The sharper comes, sees the real gold and buys the salted claim for $20,000, much to the delight of the miners when they hear of it.

"Frolicsome Florrie" (Gaumont).—It is hard to see clearly just what is the trouble with pretty Florrie. When the picture begins we see her in mischief. As the lively picture progresses we find her piling more trouble on what is already bad enough until the house is in an uproar and a crowd is collecting in the street below. In the end she is packed off to school, much to the cook's delight.

"Jimmie as a Philanthropist" (Gaumont):—Jimmie's acting in this picture is interesting, but the picture itself hasn't much literary quality or human interest. It doesn't seem to live, except at moments now and then when the gifted little player or one of the other characters makes some humanly significant gesture. One little bit is very good; it is when the fashionable woman, on finding her dog again—Jimmie had stolen it and brought it back for the reward—asks it to kiss her. Jimmie wanted the reward for philanthropic purposes.

"Dad's Boy" (Pathe).—This film gives that good, old American story of the boy who didn't want to stay on the farm—in this case it's a grocery store in a small village—but who comes home just as the old homestead is being sold out and pays off the mortgage. The story isn't very dramatic and, because it was necessary to force the situation by over-acting, to weep, for instance, when there was no real cause for tears, or even much sorrow, the picture isn't very convincing. Mr. Walthall plays the grocer's son, and the other characters in the picture are well made up to represent such types as usually were found around a country store in the eighties, including the old, wooden-legged G. A. R. man. It's a sentimental picture and many of its scenes will be pleasing.

"The Way of the Eskimo" (Selig).—This picture is unusual enough and good enough to make a good feature picture. It is markedly educational and it tells a very interesting story. The story in this setting, primitive and simple, has much beauty. The girl whom the Eskimo youth intends to make his bride is attracted by the white man, a hunter whom her lover has saved from freezing to death. The white man deserts her and her lover saves her from drowning herself and takes her to his home as his wife after the tribal medicine man has annointed her with sacred oil and chased away the evil spirit. The backgrounds are the ice fields and ice huts. Many Eskimo habits and customs and ways of living are shown as incidents in the story. It is very commendable.

Scene from "Jimmy Elopes" (Gaumont).

"The Daughter of the Watch" (Pathe).—The most commendable feature of this play is an intensely interesting background—the narrow old-world streets of some quaint city probably in Holland. In this case, since the romantic story is unusually weak for a Pathe picture, it would have added something to the interest of the film, if the locality had been told. The story of the abduction of the daughter of the old watchman and her rescue is not acted convincingly, though the actors seemed trying to reproduce the atmosphere of Rembrandt and were fairly successful. This and the quaint streets make the picture acceptable, as a story it is not convincing.

"Benares" (Pathe).—This picture of India is finely photographed and very interesting. Such films as this are slowly building up a strong cliental for motion picture shows among the best people in the community.

"New York City's Fourth of July Celebration" (Pathe).—This is more a news picture than strictly an educational one, though in truth there is nothing so educational as news. It is very interesting and shows glimpses of the parade of the nations. The Chinese dragon was a strange sight for New York to watch; and we see it in this picture curling along on the heads of many Celestrials and passing the grandstand where Mayor Gaynor reviewed the parade.

"The Indian Brothers" (Biograph).—In this Indian picture some of the customs of the red men are clearly set forth. A renegade seeks admission to a tribe and is offered a squaw's dress. No greater insult could be offered and he promptly kills the chief and makes his escape. The chief's brother goes after him to avenge the killing. The renegade has stolen a horse from and has been captured by another tribe, but upon the chief's presentation of his claims the renegade is given up. He is profuse in his thanks for his rescue, but when they arrive at the dead chief's funeral pyre he soon understands why he was rescued, and pays the penalty with his life.

"The Badge of Courage" (Kalem).—Here is a study in the psychological peculiarities of individuals which make them unutterably afraid of some things, but brave to boldness in other cases. Tom is afraid of the sea and fails to rescue his sweetheart when she is drowning. But the next day, after he has been called a coward and ordered away, he rescues her from a burning building and the past is very readily forgotten. It is a good story, well told and the characterization is excellent.

"Alice's Sacrifice" (Lubin).—Here is a story of love and sacrifice, having much in it that will interest. It tells of one girl acting as comforter and adviser to a struggling young playwright, afterward sacrificing herself and allowing him to love her actress-sister unmolested. It is the old theme of the girl forgotten in her country home when success in the big city dazzles the young man. It is well told, there is sufficient emotion in it to create a heart interest and the audience was clearly pleased with it.

"Her Dad the Constable" (Essanay).—In this comedy there's a fresh and very amusing idea. The constable's daughter is waiting in bridal veil and wreath of orange blossoms for her bridegroom, a millionaire, who has lost his train and is hurrying to her in his motor car. The girl's father, the constable, receives a telephone message to arrest a chauffeur who is speeding along the pike. This chauffeur, whom he doesn't know, is his prospective son-in-law. The ending is happy, however. The trouble with the picture is that there is too much of it; it isn't handled economically. It has the drawback that too much padding gives a novel. With the exception of the heroine and hero no one with even a fairly important part in the picture acts convincingly.

"The Warrant" (Selig).—There is an interesting, human story in this Western picture of ranch life, barroom life and a shooting incident; but stories very similar to this have been done before many times and sometimes better done. In this case the hard drinking husband of the heroine, in a barroom fight, shoots a stranger and his wife's foster father, the sheriff, persuades him to come back and stand trial rather than be lynched, perhaps. In the end it is proved that the man who was shot is wanted, dead or alive, which seems to beg the question a little. In this picture we see the heroine first as a child, then as sweet sixteen, then as a grown woman. She seems to be the only one who shows growth in the picture.

"The Tragic Wedding" (Pathe).—The background of this elaborate picture of Mexican and gypsy life is a beautiful marble palace and its immediate neighborhood a bit of sea beach and a long stretch of high road. The outlines of the story might have been founded on fact; but as conducted and acted, it is hardly convincing. Yet many of its scenes are very beautiful. The heroine lives in the palace and has fallen in love with a gypsy. In a preposterous will, her father commands her to marry a friend of his. If she doesn't do this she is to lose her fortune and will have to enter a convent. She begs the gypsy to save her. There is a capture or rescue of the girl by the gypsy band that rides hard after the wedding coach on its way to the church and overtakes it. Then the other man collects his followers and there is a revolver fight on the beach where the gypsy encampment is. The man who was to have married the girl is killed. The acting is very theatrical.

"Hubby's Day at Home" (Kalem).—A comedy which may find an answering emotion in the breast of more than one unfortunate whose experiences upon similar occasions may have partaken somewhat of the character of those depicted here. Hubby's day was filled with interesting and exciting events, such as a fight with the ice man, a run-in with the milk man, beating the rugs, and getting buried in the coal, while to end it, his cousins come from the country to visit him. That ought to be excitement enough for one day. Hubby looks as though he thought so when night overtakes him in his weariness. It is an unconvincing and surprisingly dull comedy.

"In the Arctic Night" (Vitagraph).—This film represents the struggle of a young minister with himself over the question of whether or not he shall leave the people to whom he is a missionary in the far Arctic regions so that he may go home and marry the girl of his choice. After a long prayer he decides to stay, even though he had started homeward. The picture teaches the ultimate victory of righteousness, as this young minister understood it, over his own inclinations. It is a sermon.

"Captain Kate" (Selig).—The prediction of the Selig people that each of their pictures of African scenes showing wild animals in their native haunts as accessories of a strong, human story would surpass the one that preceded it has been amply fulfilled. Captain Kate is even more interesting and commendable in every way than either "Zululand" or "Back to the Primitive," good as both these were. It is a very remarkable picture. Like the others it is exciting and like them it gives the spectators a new experience, and one which is educational. The photography of all the scenes in "Captain Kate" is markedly superior to what we usually see. These pictures, with sunlit sand, giving an almost blinding highlight clear through the picture to the far background, save for a clump of palm trees, etc., yet with the detail so clear-cut all over the picture that faces can be seen, not merely in the near foreground but also in the middle and even in the distance, are worthy of the very highest praise—they are marvels of camera work. This art permits the acting, which in almost the whole cast is very praiseworthy, to carry the story to the audience very effectively; and it's a good story, besides.

"The Lost Horse" (Lubin).—Perhaps there is just a grain of truth at the bottom of this not very funny picture story. There are people foolish enough to paint a star on the forehead of a decrepit nag in hope of collecting a reward offered for a lost race horse who has a natural star; we probably have met such people. But this film is not convincing, and hardly amusing.

"Mr. Inquisitive" (Lubin).—This horse play farce, built on the French plan, tells what happened to an over-inquisitive man who started for a walk in fine clothes and a new silk hat. In the end we see him begging the man behind the hydrant to give him a bath all over; he needed it. The incident with the darky boys and their big mother is the only new thing in the picture and the only truly American part of it.

Independent

"The Turning Point" (Reliance).—This picture is in the sensational style common in Reliance pictures of a few months back. The story, dealing mostly with the seamy side of life, in many of the scenes is acted with intelligence. This is true particularly of the parting of the young wife with her dissolute husband. The romantic scenes, later, after she has got a divorce, make pretty pictures; but the accident and rescue scenes are trite. The story, after a courtship scene, jumps two years and we see that there's a new family and a baby which has nothing to do with the story. That night the former husband breaks into the house to rob, is wounded by the husband and recognized by the wife who persuades him to let the man depart. We have seen this kind of an ending before, but we can hardly commend continued repetition of it.

"The Outlaw's Trail" (American).—In this Western story an outlaw and a Texan ranger detailed to capture him, together with the outlaw's daughter, play the principal parts. The ranger falls in love with the daughter. She informs her father they are on his trail. The ranger is captured and sentenced to be lynched. The girl rides for aid and with the sheriff's posse comes in sight of the lynching party in time to cut the rope with a rifle bullet and save his life. The father is killed in the fight that follows and the rest of the band captured. The ranger comforts the girl for the loss of her father and the film ends with the ringing of wedding bells.

"Bill Learns to Take Cinematograph Pictures" (Lux).—Bill answered the Lux Company's advertisement for a good camera man, but didn't make good at crank-turning. He was invited to learn how elsewhere. On leaving the studio he turns for practice every crank he sees and appears again at the studio after much experience, with much soiled clothes, and is again given charge of the handle. There's a sword duel being played which is to be stopped by a heroine. Bill thinks the heroine is in danger and drops the crank to save her. He gets a rapier's point in the stomach.

"Won by Wireless" (Thanhouser).—This is a most melodramatic story of what happened on a stationary yacht supposed to be sailing up the sound. The great financier was kidnapped by the villain and would have been ruined by his dishonest partner had not the heroine, his daughter, known how to send a wireless message and also how to outwit the operator. The hero gets the message and brings the police out in a launch. The old man in a final scene kicks his partner out of the office and then withdraws his objections to the daughter marrying the wireless telegraph hero. It couldn't possibly be humanly acted and certainly it wasn't.

"Tony Would Be a Cowboy" (Champion).—Here is a real wild Western horse play comedy. It illustrates the adventures of an office boy whose imagination was fired by reading of Western stories and who sees Indians and cowboys in every corner of the office. The vicissitudes of his career are set forth with considerable detail until he arrives in the West, where his reckless and altogether unexpected methods astonish the natives, both red and white, and create no end of amusement for the audience.

"The Accident" (Lux).—There is a very effective scene in this emotional picture, on the same reel with the above. It pictures the reunion of the father with his family after the accident. The father saw the family off to the seaside and was to follow by the next train. The first train is wrecked, but the family is not on board, for it has been left while at luncheon. The father delayed his start and in an hour or so sees an "extra" newspaper account of the wreck, with the names of his wife and children as among the missing.

"Generous Cowboys" (Bison).—This not very interesting picture shows how two girl sharpers hoodwinked a crowd of easy-going cowboys and thereby replenished their funds. There is comedy in it—that cannot be denied—but it isn't a very high kind of comedy.

Scenes from the Latest "Imp" Release "The Old Pastor."

"The Pony Express" (Nestor).—In this story of the West, the principal feature is the effort of a father to force his daughter to marry a wealthy neighbor who is really a famous bandit and road agent. The man she wants is the pony express rider. After the rider has saved her brother from being robbed and captures the bandit at the same time, her father humbly gives her to the man she wants, thankful that he has discovered in time the falsity of his neighbor. The characters are accurately drawn and there is a swing of reality in the picture which carries the audience with it irresistibly. The photography is admirable and adds not a little to its attractions.

"The Inventor's Wife" (Itala).—This is a skilfully laid out melodrama about an Italian inventor of high explosives and his frivolous wife, who wanted money badly enough to be welling to steal her husband's scheme for it. The play, while not a very human one, is effective from the very first scene until "God has punished her" is thrown on the screen.

"The Vagabond" (Rex).—This is a very interesting and acceptable picture of Southern life of about 1870, when the night riders were active. The vagabond is, by his trousers, an ex-Confederate army officer. He is helped by some people who own a cotton plantation (a studio scene) and the editor of the local newspaper gives him a job. This editor distributes his own type. This part of the picture is very interesting, for there's an old style hand press shown, and the usual interesting characters who were sure to be found in such offices, including the man who fought the war over again every time he got someone's attention. The fault of the picture is that we don't know positively enough that the night riders have anything against the heroine's father, for whom the vagabond sacrifices his life. The raid of the riders is very well conducted and the climax is led up to most effectively save only for the one defect just noticed. It is very well acted, especially by those who carried the character parts. The tinting and the photography were not quite up to the high Rex standard. And one is surprised that the Rex Company did not take advantage of the torch scene to give us something out of the ordinary; it had a fine chance to do so. The torch scene as shown is not much above commonplace.

"A Soldier's Life" (Great Northern).—This series of pictures depict in an amusing way the trials of a soldier. The fat man gets into trouble with his officers because of his awkward drilling, while his comrades take advantage of his greenness to make sport of him. It is probably a fair reproduction of what sometimes actually occurs about the barracks.

"At Sea Under Naval Colors" (Great Northern).—In this series of scenes, taken on board battle ships and cruisers, a fair idea of what sailors in the navy actually do is presented. The various drills are shown, including gun fire by a number of ships at once. Some of the amusements of the men are likewise reproduced.

"The Revolver is Returned to its Owner" (Itala).—This horseplay farce represents a beggar with an "I am blind" sign on his breast trying to return a revolver which he saw a man drop in passing him. An entire dry goods store and furniture establishment is wrecked before the owner is caught and the revolver returned. And then the owner gets his from the infuriated managers and customers who have suffered during the fracas.

"Toto an Enthusiast for a New Fashion" (Itala).—This is a farce which is somewhat suggestive. Toto wants to marry a woman who wears a harem skirt, having seen one in a window. He goes about from place to place lifting women's skirts to see if they have on harem trousers underneath. Of course what he gets is funny enough, but many would take offense at a film as suggestive as this.

"Nat Wills as King of Kazam" (Powers).—Nat Wills, the greatest tramp on the stage reappears in this film in one of his funniest characters. It is one of those films which is difficult to describe, but the fun is there. And the tramp's perfect self-possession under any and all circumstances constitutes the funniest parts of the picture. His elevation to the throne of Kazam is characteristic and when the former mayor, who shipped him away in a barrel arrives as consul he is forced to do homage to the king. But the fun is chiefly in the acting of Wills, which is individual and entirely characteristic.

"The Girl and the Broncho Buster" (Solax).—Here is a Western picture in which a love story is worked out to a pleasant ending. The most interesting feature is the scene where the vicious mare is subdued by the young man who wants the girl. The pictures are startling and the mechanical work has been admirably executed, when the extreme difficulties of the subject are considered. The entire picture is redolent of Western life and character.

"The Man Underneath" (Yankee).—Here is a strongly emotional film telling the story of the misfortunes of Cassidy, beginning with his signing away his rights for damages following injury in an explosion and ending with the death of his wife and child. He becomes crazed and attributes all his misfortunes to the man who induced him to sign the legal paper. He determines on vengeance and would have carried out his intention, only a little child entered to kiss her father good-night. The memory of his own child was aroused and his reason was restored. Once again he becomes the peaceful, industrious citizen, leaving vegeance to a higher power.

"Teddy's Three Duels" (Eclair).—This is one of those French films in which some clever actor does most preposterous things in such a funny way that everybody laughs. The first duel was cowboy-like with pistols, but with bicycles instead of horses. Neither of the duelists can ride a wheel well, that's what makes the duel funny. Then we have a duel with swords on roller skates, and the third duel is with fire hose, each contestant trying to outdo the other with a stream of water. It's an amusing film.

"Charlie Has a Manuscript to Sell" (Eclair).—Charlie is a dramatist and the director of the theater doesn't want to bother with him for there's a young lady calling on him. They can't escape from Charlie not even when they take a cab. They have to let him read his play. He puts them both to sleep first and topples over into slumbers himself. Perhaps its humor will best be appreciated by the literary spectator.

"A Southern Girl's Heroism" (Champion).—It will only be fair to Southern exhibitors to warn them that in this picture there are two scenes that very probably will be displeasing to white Southern spectators. The picture is intensely exciting. It is a very brave action on the part of the darkey maid to dress up as the Union officer who was to be shot at sunrise, the more because a burlap bag was tied over his head and arms. The Confederates don't know that it is not the officer, even when the firing squad is taking aim. The Southern girl, at that point, takes the bag off Topsie's head and the Union soldiers arrive and capture all the Confederates. Southerners won't like the scenes where the Union officer, accepted lover of the Confederate officer's daughter, kisses Topsie, nor will they like Topsie's taking the Union officer's left arm and marching off, the Southern heroine on his right arm, as in the closing scene. Those not likely to please Southern spectators who happen to be white.

"The Angel" (Reliance).—There is much that is humanly true in this very sentimental picture, but it isn't presented in a way that convinces very strongly. It is not more sentimental than many incidents in some of Dickens's best stories not less probable; yet the spectator of this picture of an orphan's sorrows and joys has to use his imagination and add a great deal that isn't shown before he can feel that it is true to life. The man who adopts the girl to clean his house and care for his three motherless little children makes her life no easy one. But her fainting by the wayside suggests, for instance, that she is underfed, yet she is the cook for the household as well as the washerwoman and it isn't convincing. The part of the angel was acted very sentimentally, angelically if you will, which also isn't very convincing. But the weakest part of the picture is that, to-day in America, when everyone is watching everything that is done, an orphan asylum would hardly let a girl go to so slipshod a home as the man's. A man with such a house would hardly be looked up to in a modern community.

"The Class Reunion" (Imp).—College men will appreciate this film since it is based upon a college loyalty and college friendship which outlasts the years. It tells of a professor reduced to poverty, invited to a banquet, filling his pockets with food for his hungry wife. A jewel is lost and they all submit to searching but the old professor. Out of curiosity one of the men follows him when he leaves the room and the reason of his refusal is disclosed. He tells the others and they load themselves with baskets of food, visit him at his home and cover his embarrassment with their college yells. There is a quality in this which goes straight to the heart and no one can see it without a suspicious moisture around the eyelids.

"The Way of the World" (Yankee).—This story begins with the lives of three young people. One young man is rejected by a girl because he drinks too heavily. Contrary to the usual expectations he becomes a good citizen afterward and an honored member of a detective force. She accepts another, who rises in the bank where he is employed to be cashier. But his defalcations are likely to find him out and he flees with all the cash he can find. He sends for his wife and baby and all would have gone well only the mother and baby become separated and the little one is found by the detective, and she leads him to her father's hiding-place. The reason for the flight is then disclosed. The detective takes the money, but returns the loaded revolver. The absconding cashier understands and pays the penalty. The money is returned, the matter hushed up and later the detective marries his sweetheart of long ago. The title tells the story. It is the way of the world.

"That's Happiness" (Thanhouser).—This pretty picture is in a way hardly true to life. It is a story with a pretty sweatshop seamstress for its heroine. She proves herself a heroine at a false alarm of fire in the crowded shop and is adopted by a rich woman; but she tires of riches and goes back to her old friends, for "that is happiness." The picture is very well acted by graceful players and includes a scene with real operatives of a shirtwaist factory leaving the shop at night. The effect of the picture is quite pleasing.

"A Moral Coward" (Powers).—This is a character play, but it is unusually effective. Every inch of the films is made to tell and there is nothing superfluous, nothing, noticeable to this reviewer, that distracts the spectator's attention from the picture's one object, which is to show how a woman exhibits her moral cowardice, and what she suffers on account of it. Her husband is absent and she practically forces another man who loves her, reluctantly, to come to see her. He is discovered by the police that her husband, who has returned, brings to catch a supposed burglar. The husband asks him whether he is not the man whom the police are seeking, and to shield the woman he says he is. She lets him go to prison for burglary. He gets a long term and dies in prison. It is very well acted indeed and can safely be called a strong picture.

"Her Captive" (Bison).—This is a breezy, well-conducted, unrealistic melodrama. The lovers are kept apart by an objecting parent and the lover goes West. After he has got into plenty of trouble, she follows, not knowing where he is, or anything about his difficulties. He isn't a criminal, for he only shot his man in self-defense; but he is afraid to stand trial before Judge Lynch, so we have an exciting pursuit on truly fast horses. The last scene is, while not probable, quite convincing and effective; one might add, satisfying.

A SUNDAY SHOW DECISION.

An interesting Court decision affecting the question of the operation of moving pictures in Ohio on Sunday was recently given by Judge Wm. P. Henderson, of the subdivision of the Common Pleas District, including Seneca, Hancock, Hardin and Wood counties, Ohio. The decision was rendered in the case of the State of Ohio against Hal. B. Clarke, who owns and operates a moving picture show in Tiffin. Mr. Clarke opened his show on a certain Sunday in May of this year and was arrested after he had accepted admission from a number of spectators and while the show was in operation. The arrest was based upon the ground that Mr. Clarke was guilty of violating the statute which prohibits the operation of theaters and dramatic exhibitions in the State of Ohio on Sunday, whether the same be exhibited with or without charge for admission. Mr. Clarke contended that a moving picture show was not a theater within the meaning of the statute and it was upon this contention that the case went to the Court of Common Pleas from the Mayor's Court, Mr. Clarke being found guilty and fined in the latter Court. The decision of the Common Pleas Judge reversed the holding of the Mayor upon the points raised. As a result of this decision the majority of the picture shows in Tiffin, Ohio, will be operated on Sunday, July 16th.

Mr. Clarke was represented by the legal firm of Niles & Peters, of Tiffin, Ohio. Exhibitors desiring further particulars regarding this case may receive same from them or from Mr. Clarke. This is the first case of the kind that has been tried in Ohio.

THE UNITED FILM CO.

About six months ago a film distributing agency, unique in many respects, was launched in this city by W. S. Milliken, well known as former manager of an exchange in Troy, N. Y. Handsome offices were leased at 145 West 45th Street, New York City, but there was no blare of trumpets as to what they proposed to accomplish and no stock in the company was offered for sale. So there has been much conjecture as to what the United Film Company was up to, and a World representative has at last been let into the secret, which is simply the purchase and rental of film. Mr. Milliken says that his Troy office was cut off from both the Patents Company and Sales Company program, so he proceeded to strengthen his position by interesting capital and opening other offices, 17 of which are now in operation throughout the country, but all controlled and financed from the main office. Other exchanges will be opened as fast as locations are selected and the right men found to handle them. Mr. Milliken has worked out a most perfect system of keeping tabs on the various branches. Daily and weekly reports on special blanks which are furnished to each office keep him informed as to the number of reels on hand and the number of customers taken on or dropped. It is a rule in the United offices never to make a promise to a customer that they cannot fulfill, which explains why these seventeen offices are now all on a paying basis and why Mr. Milliken wears a broad smile. System and square dealing is the plan on which the United is worked. We will have more to say about the United again, for negotiations are now on foot to make it a buying exchange or the outlet for a special program.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

KITCHELL COMES BACK.

Newark, N. J., July 15, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir.—At the risk of another rejoinder from the illustrious author of the "Road to Richmond," I rise again in behalf of the vast aggregation of "eight-cent raspberry" photoplay dramatists, and protest against the injection of side issues such as small fruits and personalities into the solemn and momentous question of adequate payment to the "outside" writer of canned comedies.

Not but that an agricultural illustration might be applicable, in a figurative sense, to the subject. The writer, likewise, has lived in the backwoods. He knows of one raspberry culturist, not particularly noted for the size and quality of his product, who gets a top-notch price for every quart marketed. His name is an unusual one—John Smith. Across the valley from Smith lives Brown, a man skilled in the use of nitrogenous phosphates and an expert in small-fruit culture. Brown's raspberries have Smith's product beat forty ways for quality—yet Smith gets the price, and Brown does not. And why? Smith has a contract with a big New York hotel which calls for so many quarts of berries a day during the season, and, raspberries being raspberries in some hotels in Gotham, Smith gets rid of an average run of product at the highest market figure. Brown, on the other hand, being a modest man and not having a speaking acquaintance with a hotel buyer, sells his berries in an open, small-town market, at an open, small-town price. There is something in being gifted with a "pull."

As Mr. Hall intimates, the writer is not in Mr. Hall's class as an inventor of photoplays. He admits the fact cheerfully. He has twice seen the "Road to Richmond," and it was a bully good military drama. The writer does not know Mr. Hall from George Washington, but he has heard from several different sources of Mr. Hall's success as a writer, and he has heard nothing but good of his work. Probably he will admit that the above-mentioned scenario is his best-known effort, and he has reason to be proud of the top-notch check—$90—that he of course received from the sale of it. Possibly he will also admit that his best work does not always bring the largest-figured checks.

Although but an "eight-cent-raspberry" dramatist, I am not at all ashamed of the stories I have written, and I am perfectly willing to back my output against the work of the "twelve-cent" favorites of fortune. If Mr. Hall will turn to the index of the first number of the Moving Picture Story Magazine, published by the Licensed manufacturers, he will find my name as the author of the only comedy scenario given a write-up in that issue of the periodical. And I will match "Mike the Housemaid," "The Taming of Wild Bill," "The Man Who Died," "Reggie's Engagement," Lubin; "Pat and the 400," Essanay; "When Old New York Was Young," Vitagraph; "The Runaway Motor Car," Pathe, and "How Bumptious Papered the Parlor," Edison—all written by me—with any eight scenarios written by Mr. Hall and already released, originality and press-criticisms to count, and the editor of the World for a referee.

Mr. Hall is an exceptional instance. Possibly he has a magnetic personality which enables him to beard the editor of scenarios in his den and to dine with a manufacturer or two, and thereby "raise the ante" to the high average of checks and acceptances received by him. Possibly, too, he caters to the "highbrow" picture maker who has a small opinion of comedy in photoplays. There are still manufacturers—and comedy directors—who imagine that the picture public is satisfied with horse play comedies and plots that have been revamped so often that the entire story "shows through" all the way from Scene One. These are the individuals who are howling for three-reel tragedies and paying tremendous prices for dramas of a type that are abhorred by the film exchange and the exhibitor.

But this is foreign to the issue. The writer affirms flatly that aside from possibly three manufacturers, the inventor of photoplays who is without a "pull" has no more chance of getting $50 for a scenario than he has on reaching a 2,500-foot level in the "sky-path" in a toy monoplane.

AT THE GRINGO MINE

Scene from "AT THE GRINGO MINE"

The men at the mine wanted more wages and sent the foreman to make their demands to the mine owner. When he failed to secure the raise, they accused him of treachery because he was in love with the owner's daughter. Both owner and foreman were taken captive, tied to a post, and would have shared an awful fate but for the ready wit and pluck of the daughter. Her reward was—the foreman.

Furthermore, I have written and sold magazine stories for the Munsey publications, Outing Magazine, Town Topics, and various publications, and I comprehend fairly well what constitutes a natural, original, and an interesting plot. Like Mr. Hall, "It has occurred to me that it might be worth while to turn out a script that seemed to me worth $50." Result: I spent two weeks in the development of a "highbrow" story that fulfilled the specifications. I sent it away, and sold it the first time out—for $15. Then I put a curb on the imagination and turned out a Western drama in eight hours that brought me in $25. Merit does not always count with the film makers.

And of the $8 script written by the writer and quoted by Mr. Hall, it was followed in its entirety by the producers, as I can prove by a comparison between the original carbon and the manufacturers bulletin—both of which are available for Mr. Hall's inspection, should he be interested in the matter. It was a half-reel scenario, and a half-reel release—and it made a hit.

That the "average scenario isn't a good drama, or comedy, or farce," is an indisputable fact. The writer has seen some of the specimens sent in from the backwoods. But there are few scenarios written that are followed exactly by the editor and the producer. How many of Mr. Hall's scripts have been released precisely as written? Mr. Hall has had exceptional opportunities to learn the limitations of the camera and of particular studios, and if he has used his opportunities to good effect he has learned that the best constructed scenario plot will not pass the studio staff, if somebody "high-up" happens to have got out of bed wrong or imagines he can improve on the manuscript.

Mr. Hall is a "highbrow." He is complacently confident that "the dramatic merit of the photoplay, on the whole, is on the upgrade, with just at present a sad backsliding to cowboys and 'guns' for the sake of the European trade." He is welcome to his opinions. If he will listen to the comments and watch the attitudes of photoplay patrons in his home town, or anywhere else, he will discover that the "highbrow" stuff fails to "get across," and that eight out of ten of Mr. Hall's favorite dramas or melodramas are uninteresting to the average American. He wants to see cowboys and comedy.

Dramatic photoplays, be they reproductions of Shakespeare, or classical tragedies, or merely the modern "dry-rot" released every week by most manufacturers, will no more save the moving picture industry from a sharp and sudden catasrophe, than could Mrs. Partington save her porch from a wetting with a broom, when the high-tide came upon it.

You cannot "elevate" your public. The game has been tried, and always with one result. Ninety-nine out of one hundred picture patrons are of the "common people," and they have no use for Ibsen and problem plays. They want to be interested and amused. If they are not interested and amused they will go elsewhere for amusement. The one hope for a lasting future of the moving picture industry lies in Mr. Hall's despised "cowboy" stories and in comedy, and the writer who is trying to write for the public and not for a manufacturer who has an inflated opinion of "highbrow junk" is not getting the money, Mr. Hall to the contrary, notwithstanding.

But Mr. Hall not only did not make his reputation as a comedy photoplay writer, but he is not sustaining his reputation on "funny stuff," and I fail to see how he has anything to do with the argument.

For it does not pay to be funny. Sincerely,

WILLIAM H. KITCHELL.

CALLS MR. HALL TO ACCOUNT.

New York, July 15th, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World,

My dear Mr. Editor: I have just read, with some interest, in your issue of the 22d the article entitled "Some Scenarios—and Others," by Emmett Campbell Hall, in which Mr. Hall takes a rap at Mr. Kitchell, Mr. Craw and scenario writers in general.

I am not a scenario writer and have no personal interest in the controversy in question, but I would like to point out to Mr. Hall some "inconsistencies" which throws him into the discard.

Quoting from "Some Scenarios—and Others": "I devoted about one-half my working time to scenario writing and find that line netted the useful sum of $1485." * * * "Having sold a total of something over one hundred scenarios—about 90 per cent. of those written by me." * * * "But if his efforts command but ten or fifteen dollars he had better try some other game. There must be nearly a thousand scenarios written for each one produced."

Mr. Hall states that he has written and sold a total of something over 100 scenarios for $1485, an average of $14.85 each, and yet he tells the scenario writer who can only command ten or fifteen dollars to try some other game. Mr. Hall also states that 90 per cent. of his scenarios are accepted, while the outsiders only net one in a thousand.

A little success, as well as a little knowledge is a dangerous thing. I presume Mr. Hall has lived so much in the realm of "Fiction" during "one-half of his working time" that simple rules of arithmetic find no place in his colossal brain. If I were in his place I would devote the "other half of my working time" to—well, call it scenario writing, if you want to.

I am sorry to have to publicly chastise you, Mr. Hall, but you deserve it and I hope it will do you good and improve your "scenarios" as well as your general average of $14.85.

In regard to the prices paid for "scenarios" by the film manufacturers, about which so much has been written in the recent issues of The World, let me call attention to the following:

The average price is about $12. I don't think it is any more. Suppose the scenario in question requires 1,000 feet to properly produce it; suppose the film manufacturer sells 60 prints at 10 cents per foot. The total sales will amount to $6,000. I am not going to give any figures on cost or any figures on profit, although I can do so, and absolutely accurate figures, too. II am just going to note a few expense items and ask a few questions.

What would you put down for "lunches for talent," "use of automobile," "electric light," "60 tin boxes for positive prints"? Put down your own figures and compare them with price of the scenario, and then think it over for yourselves. Emmett Campbell Hall please note. SCENARIO.

NAMING THE CAST.

Easthampton, Mass., June 19, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World,

Dear Sir: The subscriber has been in the moving picture business for about three years, and during that time has been approached times without number with the inquiry "What is that lady's name, or what is that gentleman's name, that appears in that picture?" Now don't you think it would interest them to know who they are? Wouldn't it be a good idea for the manufacturers to each put out a reel introducing individually their company to the public, telling who they are and something about them. We are sure the public is anxious to know these people.

Of course they are told something about them in the Moving Picture World, also there is a company that is producing slides introducing the principals to the people, but how much more appropriate it would seem to see them in a regular moving picture!

We think the day is coming when the public will not only want to know who those people are, but will want a program with the cast of the picture just as they do to-day of the stage drama. We think the exhibitors would be more than anxious to get such a reel. We cannot think of any picture that would be in such demand as a reel of this kind.

The field for the moving picture is still broad. This is only one suggestion in a thousand that await production by the manufacturers.

I should be pleased to see the Moving Picture World take up this matter and try and interest the manufacturers, so that in the near future not only the exhibitors, but the public may be more closely acquainted with the people who are furnishing them with their evening's entertainment.

Hoping that other exhibitors will take this matter up, and thanking you, I beg to remain,

Yours very truly,
WM. D. FRIEL.

ANENT SUNDAY OPENING.

Brooklyn, N. Y., June 28.

Editor Moving Picture World,

Dear Sir: I was pleased to learn of the merging of the "Film Index" and your representative sheet, and feel sure that you will never allow the pages of The World to be sullied by any such misstatements as appeared in the final issue of the "Film Index" under the caption of "The Saint, the Sinner and the Sunday Show." The author, Mr. Sargent, makes a plea in favor of opening every photoplay house on the Sabbath (but under no circumstances must vaudeville be presented), or the patrons of these places—the poor and the moderately well-to-do—having nowhere else to go on Sunday, must perforce crowd the dives and the backrooms of the saloons. Not all can get in even then, for Mr. Sargent informs us "they are 'not yet' adept at lawbreaking, so do not know how to gain admission."

After reading the article we learn that a reformer is "a person who knows the least of the cause he supports"; that hundreds of churches have picture machines installed, as well as other hundreds in Sunday School rooms. The names of these hundreds of churches and Sunday Schools, however, are omitted.

Now, I am not a reformer; neither am I in the employ of any film manufacturer or photoplay house, but, I feel competent to speak on this Sabbath question from both points as an exhibitor, as well as a church member, without bias, having no axe to grind. Mr. Sargent insults every patron of a motion picture theater when he declares they will patronize dives and saloons if denied pictures on Sunday. He insults every church member when he states that the sacred words of the Bible are to be considered as obsolete, as "men and the affairs of men have changed hundreds of times since the tablets of the Law were brought down from Mount Sinai." Of course, if you own or are interested in a motion picture playhouse, you may ignore with impunity the commandment, "Remember thou keep holy the Sabbath Day."

Mr. Sargent did not tell his readers that working men labor but eight or ten hours a day, and that they find time to crowd the theaters and the beaches; that Saturday was made a legal half-holiday in order that the Sabbath could be used as a day of rest. He did not mention how children stay away from Sunday schools to see moving pictures, even though it is against the law for the proprietor to admit them. He did not speak of the fact that the subjects presented are of the same identical nature as shown during the week. Neither does he mention the pianist, who renders the same popular airs as on Monday, or of the subjects themselves, which often fail to teach a moral.

Again, Mr. Sargent says absolutely nothing regarding the ticket seller, the ticket taker, the singer, the pianist, and last, but not least, the underpaid operator in his shirt sleeves, in a hot, stifling little iron box, rushing the film through the machine, while the manager cries, "Faster!" so that he can make room for more nickels. No, he fails to tell us why these poor artists should labor seven days a week for a six-day wage.

And yet another thing which Mr. Sargent failed to tell his readers (or perhaps he did not know): There is not a moving picture license issued in New York which gives the right to run a show on Sunday. Why they are allowed to run is because the church societies do not compel the police to enforce the law

No, we do not want a Puritanical Sabbath. We don't desire to close the picture shows, but they should be compelled to close in the afternoon, and nothing but clean, educating films shown (not of a religious nature, as the surroundings savor of sacrilege), and, believe me, the day is not far distant, after the nickel-grabber in the business has been oblitterated, the shows will be run on Sunday and be viewed by the best classes; but, this can never be accomplished by abusing the churches and their members.

Editor Moving Picture World,

Dear Sir: I see in your issue of July 8th wherein you mention something about Mr. T. K. Peters and his new camera. There has been some error made in reference to Mr. Peters' position while employed by the "Bison" Co. I wish, if you hav room, you would state that this Mr. Peters never held a position with the Bison as camera man. His position while in our emplay was as scenic artist and nothing else. I do not care to have anyone derive any free advertising through the Bison Co. unless it is facts. I think that you will understand and oblige me in this matter.

Wishing you all success, I beg to remain wants. It is an unusual topic in so far as water sports are rarely exhibited, and here we have 1,000 feet of a water carnival taken at Dubuque, Iowa, including races entered into by renowned American contestants, such as Commodore Pugh, of Chicago, and others in their equally well known power boats and racing craft. The filming of this regatta involved considerable danger, but Director Davis was not to be denied an excellent opportunity to get naught but the best views of the races, and it is to his credit that we are able to obtain a very clear sight of the dash and swirl of the swiftly racing contestants.

BEHIND THE TIMES.

One of the most gripping stories that have been filmed in months is the forthcoming Imp relcase, "Behind the Times." It is a life portrayal that rings true. By the dictum of the fashionable women of a church society the pastor, who has served the flock for years, is relegated to the rear and a younger, more stylish minister is installed in his stead and the aged teacher is made pastor emeritus. The new minister is an instantaneous favorite with the women. His teachings conform more to their way of thinking and he countenances the things that are worldly, becoming a leader in the social functions. Sickness visits a humble parishioner and the new clergyman is too busy with social duties to give her comfort. The child of one of the wealthy members of the flock becomes stricken with a contagious disease and the favorite not being acquainted with the nature of the malady, responds with alacrity. He sees the placard put up by the authorities and excuses himself, declining to enter the house. The old minister has given comfort to the poor woman and goes to the house of the wealthy patron and prays for the child, which recovers. The true character of the new minister is discovered and the old pastor is reinstated, to the complete satisfaction of all factions of the church.

Warning to the Trade.

Drastic and, in part, unwarranted regulations for the handling of motion picture film are proposed by the Municipal Explosives Commission of the City of New York. Unusual rules and before unheard of fees are among the provisions of the proposed regulations. So unjust are some of these rules that general and emphatic protest against them should be made at the hearing to be held on July 27, in order that modifications may be obtained.

To this end both exhibitors and manufacturers should be at the hearing before the commission without fail, and come prepared to make a determined fight.

One section in particular is open to severest condemnation. It reads as follows: "Sec. 16.—For a certificate of approval of a machine or apparatus for the display of motion pictures, the applicant shall pay a fee of $50."

There can be no possible reason for such a preposterous tax as this, and the adoption should be vigorously contended by picture men.

Attend the meeting and have your lawyer with you. The hearing will be held at 10 ..o'clock, Thursday morning, July 27, at Fire Headquarters, 157 East 67th Street, New York.

CORRESPONDENCE

Pittsburg

The "Nic" Theater, at Sterling and Arlington Ave., has been open to very good business, considering the hot weather. "The Chicago Stock Yards Fire," and Champion's "Service Under Johnson and Lee," were shown to a capacity house on Monday, July 17th. The projection is noteworthy. An Edison one-pin machine is used. This house has a record of being the oldest Independent house in the city, having used Independent films without a break since there were any Independent releases. Three reels of straight pictures are shown to an admission of 5c, but beginning next month, it is contemplated to run only two pictures, which will be of a later run.

The Leechburg, Pa., Grand Opera House, has been running straight Independent pictures on Saturdays only, being closed altogether the rest of the week, but it is expected to open up in full about the end of September, with vaudeville and Independent pictures. The seating capacity is 800. Mr. W. B. Ryan is the lessee and manager.

A number of enterprising merchants of Brushtown, Pa., a suburb of this city, have formed the Merchants Amusement Co., and from now on Brusbton will bave a moving picture show of its own. The first step these merchants took was to build a neat little photoplay house of 200 seats. On its opening day, Saturday, July 15th, the theater was literally jammed witb Brushtonians. Geo. Gardner, one of the oldest moving picture operators in this vicinity, has charge of the projection department.

On July 15th, the Majestic, on E. Ohio Street, one of the nicest photoplay houses in the city, was opened to the public. Messrs. Hetzel & Shatzman are the proprietors. It has a seating capacity of 185, with standing room for about fifty more. The lobby is well lit with 72 40-watt tungsten lamps, equipped with a regulation booth and a Powers No. 6. It is in a position to satisfy the most discriminating picture fan. The throw is 65 ft. on a 9 by 12 curtain.

A moving picture play, "The White Caps," bas been revived in this city. The Olympic, the foremost Independent picture bouse of the downtown section, was the first one to feature it. The Bonton was the next and quite a uumber of other picture houses contemplate featuring in order to lure the public to their shows.

A commendable feature of the Cameraphone theaters of this city, is The Cameraphone Bulletin. As a house organ, it cannot he excelled, and highest praise is due to its versatile editor for his keen foresight, in the requirements of such a bulletin by the picture fan. Not only is it brim full of stories of the pictures being shown, but it has some excellent comments on the comfort and coolness of their theaters, very cleverly written. As an inducement to their patrons to more thoroughly read the Bulletin's contents, they bave a notice, stating tbat items of interest, such as social gatherings, lodge and church entertainments, etc., will be gratefully received and published.

The Lyric, Sewickly, Pa., one of the newer photoplay bouses, has been open to splendid business. This house seats 300. The picture on the screen is exceptionally good. An Edison one-pin machine is used. The auditorium is lighted sufficiently to enable one to read a newspaper. Being aware of the bargain instinct in the average American, the Cameraphone Theaters offer a book of twenty-four tickets for one dollar.

Tbe Fourth of July battle pictures between Wolgast and Moran in San Francisco were sbown at the Lyceum, a legitimate playhouse of about 2,000 seats, beginning Monday the 7th to an admission of 25 cents and 50 cents.

The Family has a very nice bill on this week; tbe projection, though, does not come up to the standard, which is very surprising, for the Family has always been noted for its good projection.

The Duquesne is still running moving pictures. The program is very discriminately chosen, although the films are a little old. Performances are from 11:30 A. M. to 11 P. M. to an admission of 5 cents.

Business at the Theatorium has been very dull. Tbe Theatorium is a neat little house in the West View Park, fully equipped in every particular. Tbe Airdome at the same park has been playing to pretty good capacity. Both houses use an old run of Licensed films.

The Fairyland, on Arlington Avenue, has been doing fairly well. This neat little house is owned by Mr. L. Dankliff and does him a great deal of credit for tbe systematic way it is managed. Tbe house seats about 150 and is well ventilated. Licensed films bave been used in this house for over four years.

With the organization of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Pennsylvania it is expected that the motion picture show owners will be placed in better position to cope with some of the unreasonable hills that spring up now and then in the Pennsylvania legislature. The principle bill that the League will contest is the law requiring three aisles, which was passed early in 1909. The film exchanges with a few influential motion picture owners took an injunction out against its enforcement, but since the Supreme Court has upheld this law, it is up to each and every exhibitor to oppose it—and in union there is strength. The League's offices are on the third floor of Roberts Buildiug, 233 Fifth Avenue, where meetings are held every Sunday. F. J. Herrington is the president, T. J. Barbin, vice-president, and Thomas J. Morgan, cor. secretary. Application fee is $10; $5 to be paid on application and $5 in thirty days.

The New Airdome, at Homewood and Race Streets, has been running to capacity since its opening. The owners are The Homewood Airdome Co., Mr. W. H. Priest, manager.

Business has been very good at The Liberty Theater, at 4736 Liberty Avenue. E. F. Drumm is the manager and proprietor. Witb a seating capacity of 167, this theater has made more than good since it was taken over by Mr. Drumm. Equipped with a Powers No. 6 machine in a regulation booth it is in shape to project good pictures. Playing to the picture is a noticeable feature and is well appreciated by the regular patrons of this neat little house.

The Grand Theater on Braddock Avenue, Braddock, Pa., has gone dark the last week. Independent pictures were used. J. R. Robinson was the manager and proprietor.

The Fulton, at Fulton and Wylie Avenue, is a theater that caters to colored patrons, and has been playing to capacity business quite often. At its opening the policy had been to run an act of colored vaudeville or a colored stock company, with a few reels of old films for ten cents, but since its purchase by Mr. Mikolajewski three reels of good Indepondent service, with an admission of only five cents, has been inaugurated to gratifying box receipts.

Robert Webb, formerly bead repairman with The Duquesne Amusement & Supply Co., and then with The General Film Co., 436 Fourtb Avenue, has taken charge of The Pittsburg Photoplay Co.'s repair department. Mr. Webb is an inventor of no mean degree, having patented a sure-enougb film rewinder, a non-failing film guide apparatus, Webb's Bulldog Carbon Clamp, and last but not least, the best wire terminal on the market.

The Pittsburg Calcium Light & Film Co. has been revived by the old owners, notably Messrs. Clark & Rowland. The object of this firm is to fill a long felt want to Pennsylvania exhibitors, being to equip a perfect supply house in every detail, where one can get anything from a sprocket wheel to the most intricate and costly macbinery necessary for the photoplay house. At the time when Messrs. Clark & Rowland sold their several film exchanges to the General Film Co., they still had their calcium light factory on First Avenue, and now since their reopening as a supply house the factory is again in full blast. A repair department under Harry Smitb is one of the innovations. James Clark is the general manager, "just to keep himself out of mischief," be says.

Freddie Smith, the hearty good fellow and manager of the New Palace Theater, 2726 Penn Avenue, reports that he has been doing "bully" at the New Palace. It has a seating of 287, is equipped with a regulation booth and an Edison one-pin machine. The program consists of three pictures and a song slide for five cents.

Mat Tepiitz, the never-make-mistakes booker, of the Pittsburg Photoplay Co., went on a two weeks' vacation on July 17. Tbe booking worries and pleasures will now fall to Harry A. Lande, the manager of tbis concern, while Jack Warner will assist him.

A. S. Davis, manager of The Independent Film Exchange, 412 Ferry Street, bas been kept pretty busy lately enrolling new recruits and old Licensed vets to Independent ranks, and his paragon service aids bim in keeping bis lines even and in good order.

The Hippodrome, at Forbes Field, will also run two reels of films as an extra feature. Mr. Rothstein, of the Lyric Theater, will book these films, and if be uses tbe same discrimination as witb those of the Lyric and Duquesne Theaters, motion pictures will enroll more fans in its ranks.

Uniontown Pa

Uniontown, witb a population of fifteen thousand, is the unionest town in tbe Union. As a fact this town is tbe only town of its size in western Pennsylvania, having botb a local I. T. S. A. and a T. M. A. Lodge. Yea, and according to Mr. Chas. Maters, the business agent of the I. T. S. A., it is the Union man's earthly paradise, for as he jocosely puts it, even to shovel snow one must belong to a Union and have his lodge card with him to show his good standing. The clubrooms of the T. M. A. are considered the most elaborate in western Pennsylvania, cozily furnished, where one may spend a pleasant hour or two with the greatest comfort and at the least expense. The I. T. S. E. has a membership of twenty-two, and twenty-two more contented operators one has yet to find. The Uniontown Trade & Labor Council do not allow more than eight hours labor; the wage scale gives one decent wages, and even at that, it is a noted fact that almost every operator gets two or three dollars above the scale rate, so there is the cause of their contentment, and the exceptionally good projection. The officers of the I. T. S. A. No. 521 are Chas Rutter, president; James Glenn, secretary; and Chas. Mater, business agent. Mr. Mater was appointed delegate to the Wheeling, W. Va., convention and on his way he dropped off at the Smoky City to see some of his old pals, and incidentally to pay some of his back dues in the Pittsburg Local, of which he is also a member.

The Dixie Theater, on Pittsburg Street, under the management of Frank L. Hall, its owner, has been doing splendidly since its opening. Mr. Hall is one of the pioneer moving picture men in this vicinity, having operated a circuit of moving picture and vaudeville houses in West Virginia for a number of years. The Dixie seats 800 patrons at every performance and is well ventilated, as are all the houses in this town. It is equipped with two latest Type B. Edison machines in a regulation asbestos booth. The program consists of three to four acts of star vaudeville from Poli's circuit, and three reels late run Independent pictures. Admissions range ten to thirty cents. At the featuring of the Fall of Troy and Grenadier Roland, many patrons were turned away and even standing room was at a premium that day, although the admission price was almost doubled for these features. Mr. Hall is a thorough Union man himself, for in a recent controversy between some Union and non-union men he gave the following recommendation to the local:

"June 13, 1911.

"To Whom It May Concern.

"I herein wish to make a plain statement that I have employed Union men, and nothing but Union men at the Dixie Theater since its opening, June 6, 1910. The services of said men have been entirely satisfactory, and we wish for nothing else but Union men, as the Dixie is Union always, from beginning to end. This statement also applies to the Imp Theater. Both theaters are glad to have this fact known to the public in general, and sincerely wish all good Union men good luck and prosperity. Very respectfully,

"FRANK L. HALL."

Next in importance comes the Imp Theater on Main Street. This theater is the most elaborate and comfortable theater in the vicinity, having been built at a cost of $7,000. The fresco of the lobby is of a rare and distinct type, the salient feature being four projecting Imp heads, behorned in the most approved fashion, grimacing comically at the passerby, whicb involuntarily brings a smile. This bouse is very well ventilated and very cozy. The seating capacity is 336 seats. The Imp is equipped witb a regulation booth and two Edison one-pin projectors. The ventilation consists of three exhaust fans, six celling fans, and as many revolving fans. This house is under the capable management of Chas. Case. The owners are Messrs. Case, Hall & Miles. Shraight run Independent films are used and has aided this theater in its strenuous competition against an older established Licensed house across the street. To a general admission of five cents this house is open from 11:30 in the morning until 10 at night, using three Union operators in its projection battalion.

The West End has closed its doors for the summer and will reopen on the first of September with legitimate drama, under the management of Harry Beeson. This theater, with a seating capacity of 1,600, is the largest in town. Vaudeville from Gus Sun was used. The admission being 10, 20 and 30 cents. Mr. Beeson, who had successfully managed this playhouse for over six years, two years ago leased it to The Consolidated Amusement Co. J. L. Kaufman, manager, will come back to his own this year. Under his capable management it is boped that tbe bouse will do a larger volume of business than it has been doing lately.

The Lyric Theater, on Main Street, across the street from the Imp, reports good business. Tbe manager is Lew Sitnek, well known in the local moving picture circles as a capable manager and good fellow. The Lyric seats about 425 persons. It is well lighted, well ventilated and well equipped. The bootb is a regulation and houses two Edison Type B. machines.

The Oxford is a neat little Photoplay house seating 225 under the management of its proprietor, William James. It is located a little bit out of the way, being three blocks from where the Imp and the Lyric are glaring at each other with advertised features, so it happens that tbe Imp and the Lyric get the cream of the business, wbile the Oxford gets the milk; but it happens that the milk is rich enough, so that the Oxford is doing very well after all. Equipped with two Type B. Edison machines, the projection on the screen is very well done. Mr. James has just switched from Licensed to Independent ranks.

The Grand Opera House, with a seating capacity of 900, is the last of Union-men's-town sextette of playhouses. It is playing legitimate "drammer" under the management of Fred Robbins.

EDDIE WHEELER.

New England

Manager F.M. Engley reports that his new theater, to be devoted to moving pictures, at Rockland, Maine, is now rspidly nearing completion. Tbis house will have a seating capacity of 750.

C. L. Benson, who succeeded Louis Boas as general manager of the Bijou and Premier Theaters, both of Fall River, Mass., has now heen at his post long enough to show his calibre. Both these houses, devoted to popular vaudeville and pictures, are doing very nicely. Mr. Benson has resson to feel proud of the results of his efforts on these thesters, and is certainly in line for a hig share of the Fall River business as soon as the cool westher starts in.

The Lincoln Park, Worcester, Mass., is doing well this summer with "pop" vaudeville and pictures, since its opening day. C. W. Fleming is in charge of the Psrk this summer.

Newport, R. I., is one of the New England cities that finds the theatrical business more hrisk in the summer than at sny other time of the year —due to the great influx of visitors to thls popular resort. As a result Sheedy's Freehody Park, C. E. Cooke, manager; the Opera House, E. B. Holmes, mansger; snd the Colonial Theater, H. A. Kaull, manager, are all doing an excellent husiness, via the route of "pop" vaudeville and pictures. The "S. R. O." signs sre not at all infrequent at these houses, and it is always a diffieult matter to procure seats, except before the performances are scheduled to start.

The Pier, at Old Orchard, Maine, has sgsin opened for its summer season of "pop" vaudeville and novelties. Old Orchard is a most popular New England resort, with its heach and other resources, and the Pier is always a good winner. Mr. Fred Yates is now managing the Pier, as the senior Mr. Yates died last winter.

The Scenic Theater, New Britain, Conn., is holding its trade well, notwithstanding the hot westher. This is due in ,some measure, at least, to the large electric fans introduced into the Scenic by the local management.

The Nahant Theater, Nahant, Msss., is having no difficulty in filling its auditorium daily this summer. Last year, the Nahant Theater wss opened as an exponent of musical comedy shows. This proved to he unpopular, and towards the end of the summer season pictures were introduced with Immediate success. Accordingly, the house was opened this year with Independent service from the W. E. Greene Film Exchange, of Boston.

The Scenic Theater, Nantasket, Mass., is certainly gaining its share of the trade at this resort, as the house is crowded both early and late. "Pop" vaudeville and pictures are being offered.

The Comique Theater, East Cambridge, Mass., has closed for the summer, after completing a most prosperous season. The house will re-open early in August, with Independent service and illustrated songs.

The work of enlarging the Olympic Theater, Lynn, Mass., is progressing with remarkahle rapidity. The moving stairway is now fully completed, and is to he used for the convenience of halcony patrons. Manager Lord, together with Proprietor Horsman, are both working night and day, in an endeavor to open their immense theater on Labor Day. As this house will he not only one of the largest, hut also one of the finest and most modern photoplay theaters in this country, the World's New England representative will present World readers with both photographs and with a detailed write-up of the Olympic, upon its completion.

Messrs. Glover and Harris Ware, operating the Dreamland Theater, Beverly, Msss., have lost that house. The Dreamland has heen taken by the Boston Amusement Co., who acquired the lease from the owner of the house, W. L. Woods. Messrs. Ware Brothers have decided that motography is here to stay, and are now building a new moving picture theater on Cabot Street, Beverly. This house is expected to be one of the finest houses of its kind in New England. Fifty thousand is the figure that the new house is to cost. It will seat 1,000 people; will he fireproof and of the best construction from cellar to roof. Labor Dsy is the date set for the opening.

On Mondsy, July 17, the New Central Theater, Lynn, Mass., added vaudevilie to its regular hili of Independent pictures. This is a curious fact, as the majority of houses in New England are either throwing out their "voodeveal" over the summer, or are using but little of the "ratists." Moe Mark's Comique Theater, of Lynn, is having no trouble in crowding his house, without the nse of vaudevilie, even over the warm weather.

The Scenic Theater, Fields Corner, Mass., was closed hy order of the sheriff, hecsuse of unpaid hills. Manager Lydon, of the Imperial Theater, South Boston, Msss., saw a chsnce to benefit from the plight of the Scenic Theater, and picked up some hargains at the sheriff's ssle. Lydon's Imperial in South Boston, is one of those quiet houses, of which not much "news" is heard. Nevertheless, the Imperial is always well crowded, and no one ever remembers having heard Mr. Lydon remark that he was finding "the going rough."

The mangement of the Bijou Theater, New Britain, Mass., requested a license to operate an airdome from the local authorities. It speaks worlds for the esteem in which the Bijou is held, that the license was promptly granted, as Connecticut is not "sweet" on airdomes. The new open-air theater was opened this week, and played to a house that overflowed. The Bijou Theater has had a good season, as has Keeney's Theater, which closed last week, and will reopen on Labor Dsy, after making alterations.

HENRY.

Washington, D. C.

Tom Moore, who has been so long identified with the Licensed faction of the moving picture industry, has at last changed the service of the Plszs to the Independents. He ssserts that his action is hecause he could not get the service he desired from the Licensed exchange. The Plaza, which is oue of the Moore chain of thesters, will show at least one reel on the day of release. Since Marion Leonard snd "Little Mary" are such favorites with the pstrons of the theaters here, the Plsza will make a point of having one or hoth of these pantomime actresses on the screen daily. Whether or not all the Moore houses will use Independent goods has not yet heen determined, hut at any rate several theaters are already using these films. The entering of Tom Moore so heavily into what was formerly his opponent's field, hss come as a surprise to some, and has, at the same time, taken considerahle patronage from the Licensed ranks. Mr. Moore will he remembered as the first exchange man of Washington, long before the Independents were dreamed of. He has seen the industry gradually develop here and although he has suffered many ups-and-downs himself hy fire losses, he has always heen ahle to rise to the emergency. Mr. Moore has not heen in very good health this summer and he will leave shortly for a trip somewhere for rest and recuperation. His "little wife" will accompany him, of course.

The presentation of the film, "Macheth," was enhanced recently at the Virginia hy incidental remarks by one of the Columhia players of this city, Mr. Theodore Hardy. In several instances excellent rendition of the lines of this drama were given. While some explanation was necessary to this reel, it is always difficult to he heard above the noise of tbe projecting machine and the buzz of the electric fans. If the motion picture machine would make less noise in the small houses short talks could be advantageously featured very often.

The military company of the Solax Company have spent a very profitable three weeks in Washington, using the natural scenery in and around Fort Myer with the United States Fifteenth Cavalry. The company has been under the direetion of Mr. Blacke and Mr. Wilbert Melville. The former left early in the visit, so that the hulk of the work is falling upon Mr. Melville, through whose personal efforts the services of the government troops were secured. Several photoplays were taken, which will shortly be seen on the screen. Not only were the cavalry manoeuvres captured hy the camera man, hut even the officers themselves were suddenly made actors, so these will he real military reels from the Solax Company.

The Colonial and Pickwick, theaters of the Brylawski forces, are advertising an exclusive service of first shown pictures. These are two of the oldest houses in the city, which are always well patronized on Pennsylvania Avenue.

In a recent talk with Manager Darby, of the Lafayette and Chevy Chase theaters, the conversation drifted into the influences of good and evil of the motion picture. Instances were told and finally Mr. Darby related this story: "About a year sgo a man came out of a theater I was managing, which has a restaurant on one side and a saloon on the other, and walking up to me he said, 'Yes, I know I'm crying and I'm not ashamed of it, but that play I've just seen has made me a better man and a hetter husband,' and he walked on with uneven galt. I had often noted this same man pass the doors of my house after he had visited the saloon, so I didn't put much stock into the sincerity of what he said. Still, it made me curious to observe him and see just what would happen. It was not long before I noted him making nightly visits to my theater, bringing with him bis wife and children. The saloon seems to have heen forgotten and the man now walks even and upright, with a more contented expression on his face. You can take this for what it is worth, but it certainly shows an influence of the motion picture."

Mr. J. Henderson, of the Henderson North of England Film Exchange, Newcastle-on-Tyne, England, spent several days recently in Washington, enjoying the heauties of the city, visiting the public huildings, and looking over the motion picture business here. As he is quite an admirer of President Lincoln, he was pleased to see the many souvenirs relative to the great president and his family, which are now collected in the house in which President Lincoln died after his assassination. Mr. Heuderson's visit to the White House also afforded him genuine pleasure. He was, however, quite severe in his criticism of our lax guardianship over curios, especially in the Executive Mansion. "Why we would have the King's Guard sround these cases," he declared. "Someone might molest them." And he really was surprised that no one was attempting to molest them. He wss amazed at the free access we have to the house of the president.

He was more than delighted with his visits to the various motion picture houses here. "And America makes such fine films," he exclaimed. "I don't know what we would do without them. We need them."

The desire for first-day-run reels and the changing of all films daily did not appeal to our English associate in the business. For in Englsnd reels make a weekly run and if the crowd is still good financially the reel is retained for another week.

The selection of films is a personal matter with the exhibitor in England, who visits the exchange, where he spends a long time reading over synopses, seeing the films if possible, and having a general conversation about the reel before finally determining that he wants to exhibit it. It is a matter of taking a week to do hooking in England, hut that would not do in America. Some of the "emergency" hookings that have to he done here would uo douht make him gray in a night.

Mr. Henderson spent several hours one morning in the office and workshop of the Dexter Poster Service, and was positively astonished at the amount of work that was heing so quickly done. "Truly, America is rightly called the Country of Hustle," he remarked one time, as he watched the painters ornament hanner after hanner or make some original poster to fit a certain film, all to he delivered hy 11 o'clock thst morning. Mr. Dexter himself had a hrush in hand, talking as he formed his letters and scrolls. Suddenly Mr. Henderson looked at his watch and remsrked in amazement, "Only 10 o'clock! and look how much work has heen done! Why we Englishmen would scarcely have finished our morning cup of tea hy this time. I don't know how you do it."

"It's got to he done," is the only reply we can make.

The primsry cause of Mr. Henderson's visit to America is to get an insight into the motion picture industry of America; to get new ideas and improvements for this same industry in England. He acknowledges that we are far in advance in the matter of enterprise and helieves he will have many new schemes to present to his English hrethren when he returns. He is also taking in the sights of the country as well and was thoroughly pleased with his visit to the capital of our republic.

L. J. Chamberlain, manager and proprietor of the Theatorium, certsinly helieves in giving his patrons good shows and notwithstanding the hot weather, business has been fine. On Wednesday, June 28, "Uncle Tom's Cahin" was given in its entirety, with a four-piece orchestra and a soprano soloist. The music was especially arranged hy W. C. Beane, pianist at the Theatorium and consisted of the hest of the Southern Negro melodies and some of the original dramatic music of the play. Miss Sadie Williams of Mt. Carmel, Pa., rendered "Old Kentucky Home," when "Uncle Tom" was sold at the end of the first reel, and "Abide With Me" at the death of Eva, and received merited applause. The film, although a year old, was in good shape, photographically, hut it had to he "touched up a hit," here and there, but that was easy for our operator, "Doc" W. E. L. Reeger. "Doc" knows his business, and a film has got to he "some" bsd when he cannot "put it over" in good shape. The house was packed, afternoon and evening, thus proving that the people will always have a warm spot in their hearts for "Uncle Tom's Cahin." The Vitsgraph Co. of America, may well feel proud of their production, for none of the characters were overdrawn. It is possible we may repeat this show in the near future. The orchestra was composed of Messrs. C. Fisher, violin; B. D. Chamberlain, flute; W. C. Beane, pianist, and O. J. Powell, drums and traps. Messrs. Beane and Powell are regular attachés of the house. Mr. Powell has just bought a new set of chimes and rendered "Suanee River," during one of the scenes of the drama. Mr. Chamberlain has had many requests for "A Tale of Two Cities," and ran it Wednesday, July 5, to crowded houses. The same orchestra that rendered the music for "Uncle Tom's Cahin" wss used and special music was arranged hy W. C. Beane, consisting of excerps from "Raymond" and "Rohespierre" overtures, "Il Trovatore," etc. The music was far different from that of a week ago, hut the men in the orchestra were all experienced musicians and put the music through in fine shape snd received a great deal of credit for their good work. It is Mr. Chamberlain's intention to have these "feature nights" occasionally. He has a number of requests now, for certain pictures and as soon as he can get them they will he given. Mr. Chamherlain also owns the Theatorium, at Mt. Carmel, and on Saturday, July 8, "Faust" was run with the special music, to crowded houses. It was nearly midnight when the "Good night" slide was flashed on the screen. Miss Rose Beaver, of Mt. Carmel, presided at the piano and handled Pathe's special music in an ahle manner.

Seattle

The Orpheum and Empress Circuits, consisting of 64 vaudeville theaters, have changed from licensed to Independent pictures. The change went into effect Monday, July 3.

Jay Haas, formerly an operator at the Orpheum Theater, Seattle, has abandoned that line of endeavor and become advertising manager for all Eugene Levy's theaters.

W. H. Harbeck, official photographer of the Canadian Pacific Railway, gave a private exhibition of his pictures at the Dream Theater July 5. These pictures were described in a recent issue of The World.

Manager S. A. Powell of the Coliseum Theater secured the coronation pictures from James Curtis of Vancouver, B. C., and did an enormous business on July 4th. The pictures in question were secured by Mr. Curtis from London, direct, through the efforts of Fred C. Smith and M. Duke, both formerly connected with the Family Theater, Vancouver, B. C., and who went to London for that purpose. The following synopsis will be interesting: Scenes of interest.—Proclamation of King George V.—An official visit to Guild Hall.—Passing through the streets of London.—Deputation to the King at St. James' Palace.—Preparing for the Naval Review.—Troops departing for the line of parade.—Maneuvering in St. James' Park prior to taking stations.—Decorations of the streets of London.—Firing guns in St. James' Park.—Coronation pictures.—England's Might, different battleships in review with torpedo fights. The above consumed three reels of close up scenes of good photography. These were the first pictures of the coronation to reach the Northwest. The trip from London was made in nine and a half days—a record breaker. Efforts were made by parties in Spokane to prevent their arrival in Seattle for July 4th, but the attempt was not successful. From Seattle they went to Victoria and then to Vancouver, B. C. Mr. Curtis has been connected with the picture business for the past fifteen years and is entitled to much credit for the success of this enterprise.

A motion picture projecting machine has been installed in the State School for the Deaf at Vancouver, B. C., for the purpose of giving instruction and amusement to the pupils of that institution.

W. D. Gross has opened a picture theater at Skagway, Alaska. A complete outfit has been installed by the Seattle Stage Lighting Co., and includes a Powers No. 6 projecting machine. Mr. Gross has a theater at Ketchikan, Alaska.

The Bijou Theater, on First Avenue, Seattle, owned by H. O. Allen, secured the first showing of the "Mutt and Jeff" series in this city and played to capacity business Saturday, July 1.

Eugene Levy, of the Levy Amusement Co., has opened the Spokane Theater, Spokane, one of John Cort's houses, with pictures and vaudeville. Mr. Levy is considering a proposition to put pictures in all Cort's houses this summer. He has also secured the Washington state rights for the Wobligast-Moran fight pictures.

E. W. Grossbeck has opened a very pretty picture theater at Carbonado, Wash. The equipment was furnished by the Seattle Stage Lighting Co.

In the Mississippi Valley

Harry Timmons and Edson Hoggard, of Lovington, Ill., have purchased the Photoplay House in Lovington from Frank Stanley and will run a nightly show except in the extremely hot weather, such as has been making the Mississippi Valley intolerable. In the heated term they will run Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays. Miss Vivian Timmons is pianist and Messrs. Otis, Dawson and Edson Hoggard singers.

The stockholders of the Collinsville Opera House Co., at Collinsville, Ill., at their annual election named the following entertainment committee: J. H. Siegel, Henry Kluge and A. C. Gauen.

F. S. Fraser, manager of the White Palace Theater, at Mendota, Ill., has leased the Germania Opera House in that city.

The Haish Auditorium, at DeKalb, has closed for a few weeks partially on account of the hot weather, but principally to allow Manager Fox and his helpers to make some improvements upon the interior.

Paris, Ill., has adopted an ordinance requiring a license fee of $5 a month from nickelodeons.

The Lyric Theater Co. has purchased the Lyric Theater at Robinson, Ill., from Musgrave & Brown. The place will continue with moving pictures and vaudeville.

The plan of the Springfield, Ill., News in devoting a certain space each night to the advertisements of the local photoplay houses is appreciated by the patrons. In a one-inch space the program can be easily given and the man who does not state the make of his film will lose money.

Sharrock & Sharrock, proprietors of the Dixie Theater, at Vandalia, Ill., announce that they will show no pictures that will shock the most sensitive person. Miss Bertha Shears is singer.

The Gem Theater, at Newton, Ill., conducted by S. D. Pidge, was destroyed by fire July 5. All the equipment was lost in addition to Mr. Pidge's household goods, which were stored in the rear of the building. His total loss was $1,500. He did not own the building.

Winholt & Weig are giving a moving picture show each Tuesday and Saturday night at Alpha, Ill.

A permit has been issued to the West Side Amusement Co., of Milwaukee, to build a theater to cost $15,000 on Lisbon Street near Twenty-seventh Street.

The airdome at Tenth and Vermont Streets, Quincy, Ill., is one of the string operated by the Gately Amusement Co., backed by the Gatelys, of "A dollar a week" clothing fame. Besides the one in Springfield, Ill., they have a string of open air theaters in the South.

Bennis & Nases have closed the Empire Theater, at Lincoln, Ill., until September.

Moving pictures as a part of a sane Fourth celebration, were successful at Mount Morris, Ill., and at the Soulard Playground Celebration in St. Louis.

The Miles Theater, at Minneapolis, which offered films for the week of the Civic Jubilee is so well pleased that they will be continued for several more weeks.

Acting upon the suggestion of Mrs. Perry Starkweather, of the Woman's Department of the Minnesota State Labor Bureau, President A. E. Horn, of the St. Paul School Board, has recommended that the question of installing moving picture machines in the schools of that city be considered. Mrs. Starkweather has made a study of moving picture conditions in Minnesota and asserts that $80,000 has been spent for moving pictures by the children of the State.

The American Hoist & Derrick Co., of St. Paul, finds after two years that moving pictures is the best form of advertising at conventions. It has a film of a steam shovel in action, which shows the workings of their machinery in an ideal manner. Another reel exhibits the log-loading machinery and is enlivened by teams of oxen breaking log jams and busy sawmills. "The results," President Oliver Crosby says, "are highly satisfactory—more so than I expected when planning the experiment."

F. H. M.

St. Louis

A new musical comedy company has been organized by J. M. Dubbs, chief producer of the O. T. Crawford Vaudeville Company. He has obtained some of the very best talent in St. Louis for this show, which has not yet been named, but which will be on the same order of the Casino Novelty Company, of which Mr. Dubbs is the producer. In addition to plays Mr. Dubbs is also producing motion pictures of each company, which are shown preceding the appearance of the company on the stage. The idea has proved very successful. Fred Wayne, principal comedian of the Crawford circuit, has been appointed chief stage director. Mr. Wayne has become a favorite throughout the circuit because of his funny jokes and songs. The following companies, organized by Mr. Dubbs, are playing with much success: The Garrick Players Company, a dramatic cast, at the Union Airdome; The Casino Novelty Company, at the Beeman Theater; The Monarch Minstrels Company, containing some of the best blackface artists in St. Louis, at the Nebraska Airdome. High class vaudeville is appearing at the Juniata, Gravois, Delmar, Cherokee, and Hoffitt theaters.

The Arco Airdome, at Arco and Manchester Avenues, another of O. T. Crawford's latest airdomes, opened July 15 with high class vaudeville and the first run films. The Arco is one of the most improved airdomes of the Crawford circuit. The stage is built of solid concrete and is equipped with a fly-loft, which facilitates the changing of scenery, and the latest device in footlights which completes the electrical effects. The box office is a very pretty structure, finished with Italian marble, with a dome studded with red lights. The seating capacity is 2,000. Admission price is ten cents.

The Corondolet is another airdome now under construction by O. T. Crawford, at 7900 South Broadway. It is on the order of the Arco and will be opened next week with high class vaudeville and pictures.

The Savoy Airdome, at Vandeventer and Morgan Streets, has been showing a feature film entitled "The Hippotamus Hunt," which drew large crowds nightly. In addition to pictures the Savoy has also booked feature vaudeville to entertain its patrons.

Louisville

Moderated weather during the past week has worked wonders in the picture show world. Louisville amusement emporiums are now playing to capacity houses ,one and all, although they were running on very light schedules only ten days or so ago and, of conrse the marked improvement is hailed with enthusiasm by the magnates.

"Business is all right," was emphatically reported to the correspondent of The Moving Picture World at The Majestic, near the Louisville Custom House.

L. J. Dittmar, of the Majestic Amusement Company, operating the Majestic and Royal theaters, returns from New York City this week, having been absent for a week or more upon a business trip.

The Kinemacolor Company, of which L. J. Dittmar is an incorporator, which was formed to handle the Kinemacolor films of King George's coronation through Kentucky, Indiana and Ohio, has not yet commenced operations in Louisville. The company is negotiating for a big local playhouse for a week or fortnight's run of the coronation views, which were specially made, and are said to be among the best on circuit. The deal for the local house will be completed in the near future and the Kinemacolor show will be introduced to the Bluegrass.

The week's business at The Crystal, on Market Street, near Third Avenue, is reported to have been wonderfully improved by moderated weather. The Crystal is showing a regular run of Independent films.

Work of construction was commenced last week at 410 South Fourth Avenue, Louisville, where The Novelty, a $30,000 theater, to be managed by the 3-Falls-Cities Amusement Company, will stand. The old building, which occupied this prominent downtown site, has been razed and by September 15, one of the handsomest moving picture houses in the South will have been reared. M. Switow, president of the 3-Falls-Cities concern, says that no expense will be spared to make the Novelty one of the most up-to-date establishments below the Mason & Dixon line.

Joseph Steurle, Fred J. Dolle, Henry Reiss. Herman Goecke and others of the Broadway Amusement and Ideal Amusement Companies, operating the Ideal Airdome, at Twenty-sixth and Market Streets, will hold a meting this week to determine upon definite plans for the erection of a $30,000 moving picture theater of handsome design to occupy the airdome site. Business has been so good at the airdome since its opening that a permanent house is to be erected. The theater, when erected, will be the first of its klud in the West End of Louisville, and will be modeled along the lines of the handsome Broadway Theater, at Eighteenth Street and Broadway. Its seating capacity will be about 1,200, and the most approved style or architecture and interior fittings will be incorporated.

During one of the worst lightning storms in the history of Louisville, which occurred one afternoon last week, The Empire, at 736 East Market Street, was struck by a bolt which ran down the outside electric wiring of the building, tore open an iron pipe surrounding the wiring as it reached the interior and set fire to woodwork inside. Two picture machines were wrecked, but a box containing six valuable films was uninjured. The theater was not showing at the time of the accident and no one was injured, the property loss being luckily limited to about $700. Manager H. B. Strube says that his loss was fully covered by insurance and the work of repair was so prompt that the establishment was in running order again in a couple of days.

R. S. Porter, proprietor of The Comet Theater in Paris, Ky., has decided to run his house only on periodically featured occasions, showing extra special films instead of a run of regular attractions. Mr. Porter has secured the "Coronation," "International Auto-Race" and "The Fall of Troy" views, as well as films of an educational nature, such as "The Tale of Two Cities," and believes that his special feature plan is going to be a winner with his clientele.

A handsome picture show, to be equipped with a Ramsey Motorgraph, is being installed in connection with the Hippodrome vaudeville Theater in Lexington, Ky. The pictures will be separate and distinct from the vaudeville attractions and will be shown in one of the most up-to-date little theaters in that section. Work of construction upon the new Lexington house is being rushed so that it will be completed by the opening of the Bluegrass Fair next month.

The Chamber of Commerce of Chattanooga, Tenn., passed judgment last week upon the 2,000 feet of film manufactured by the Industrial Moving Picture Company of Chicago, Ill., the views showing the scenery and natural resources surrounding the Tennessee city. The Chamber of Commerce decided that the views were inaccurate, badly shaded and lacking in vivid motion, so that the films were rejected, with the proffer of another chance to the manufacturers if they wished to try again.

Indianapolis

Charles L. Sutherland, the founder of moving picture theaters in Indianapolis, died suddenly at Sunflower Cottage, Tomahawk Lake, Wis., on Friday, July 14. His death was unexpected. Mr. and Mrs. Sutherland went to Wisconsin on May 25 for the summer and it was not even known Mr. Sutherland had been ill, until news was received of his death. Mr. Sutherland started the first moving picture theater in Indianapolis a little more than three years ago. This was the Bijou. Later on he established the Casino and about two years ago, with Dickson and Talbott, theatrical managers, established the Orpheum, the finest strictly moving picture theater in the city.

PATHE.

RAISING OSTRICHES IN EGYPT (July 29).—Here is a mighty interesting film showing how these great birds are raised and cared for in the Land of the Sphinx. We see them in the big pens racing around in an effort to get the exercise they need; see them with their young, being fed, etc., etc.—all very instructive and amusing.

THE SPINSTER'S MARRIAGE (July 26).—In order to avoid paying a fine of $100 imposed by the town council on all spinsters and bachelors, the homeliest old dame in the village decides to marry. How she accomplished it and how she chose between a dwarf and a giant makes a side-splitting comedy.

AS FATE DECREED (July 27).—A young monk is unhappy under the restrictions of the monastery and he escapes. He marries, enters business and is remarkably successful at first. Reverses come, however. His child dies; his business fails; his health is broken, and finally, weary of life and the world, he staggers back to the monastery and dies at the feet of the image of the Saviour.

THE FICKLE FIANCEE (July 28).—A homeless girl is seen fainting by the roadside by a stalwart young farmer and he takes her home, where his mother cares for her and restores her to health and strength. The weeks pass and the young fellow falls in love with the girl and hopes to marry her, but she being fickle is not faithful to her lover, who sees her accepting the attentions of another. The picture has a touching appeal.

THE SHERIFF'S PUNISHMENT (July 29).—The sheriff is in love with money. One day he gets a chance to bag a fifty-dollar bill and put the blame on another, and he does it. The victim, who can't explain, gets in worse and worse and finally has to hide in his sweetheart's trunk. He is discovered by the perfidious sheriff, however, and about to be tried when everything is suddenly set right.

BIOGRAPH.

A COUNTRY CUPID (July 24).—Edith, the little school teacher, and her sweetheart, Jack, have a quarrel, and as she is beloved by all the scholars, they extend their sympathy. Little Billy in particular is deeply grieved, and when she writes a letter to her sweetheart calling him back, but which her pride makes her ashamed to mail, Billy gets hold of the note and sees that it reaches the proper party. Jack hastens to Edith, and we find that Billy's act does more than effect a reconciliation, for it saves Edith from the terrible advances of a half-witted country boy, hitherto considered harmless, who also loved the little teacher, overstepping the boundary line of rationality in threatening death to both if she did not reciprocate his affection. The girl, however, knowing the half-wit's weakness for flowers, soothes him with a bouquet until Jack enters and releases her from her terrible ordeal.

THE LAST DROP OF WATER (July 27).—Jim and John, long-time friends, are the suitors for the hand of Mary. Jim is a chap of exemplary qualities, while John is a weakling and given to drink. Fate has it so that Mary accepts John. After their marriage they start off across the plains for more promising lands, Jim going along as one of the party. On the way over the Great Desert, they are beset by hostile Indians. The fate of the party of tourists hangs in the balance for a long time as they are enclosed in a stockade formed by the wagons, repelling the Indians until the supply of water gives out and death from thirst seems inevitable. A call for volunteers to get water is made. Jim and John both go in its quest. Jim has given his last drop to a feeble old man as he leaves the stockade, while John, meeting Jim perishing with thirst on the desert, gives up to him the last drop between life and death. This draught renews the strength of Jim, who finally succeeds in finding water, while John drops in the sand, a victim of his sacrifice. Meanwhile the troops have been notified and the party is rescued from the besieging redskins.

ESSANAY.

MR. WISE, INVESTIGATOR (July 25).—Mr. Wise seeks employment in the service of his county and is given appointment as investigator. Armed with a badge he begins work on Monday morning. His daily investigations get him into all kinds and varieties of trouble, and on Sunday when he unintentionally liberates a gang of hoboes out of a country calaboose, he is made to do time in their stead. This decides him that one week as an investigator is enough and he quits the job.

FIVE BOLD BAD MEN (July 25).—A desperate looking gang of men read in the newspapers that an Italian, one Tony Adduccio, has inherited a large fortune. Hastily penning a threatening note they slip cautiously out and mail it. That night, Tony Adduccio, the wrong Tony, by the way, laboriously pushes his banana cart up to his front steps when his wife runs out of the house, showing him the letter. The letter is opened, but neither can read English and are in a quandary as to what to do, when a lineman, working on a telephone pole, comes down from his high perch and voluuteers to read the letter for Tony. The lineman proposes a scheme to foil the bad men, and summoning two policemen they go to the place where the money, $10,000, is supposed to be placed. The lineman rigs up his trap, a storage battery and a few wires, and then waits for the black hand. At the appointed hour the bad men slip cautiously on the scene and all are entangled in the electric wires. The electrician turns on the "juice" and after giving them an extra hard jolt the policemen dash on the scene and easily handcuff the gang.

THE CLOWN'S BABY (July 28).—Little Marjorie is the daughter of Jim Phelan, a trapeze performer, who in the first part of the story is killed by a fall from the high swing and Marjorie is adopted by Pierro, a clown. A few weeks later while enroute, Pierro is visited by a wealthy couple, who desire to adopt Marjorie. Pierro finally consents to part with Marjorie, and the little girl goes to live with her foster father and mother, for whom she evinces but little love. A dreary year passes by for the little girl. With her lessons, which make each day almost endless, she wanes in body and spirit until Mr. Herbert one day brings home a doll dressed to resemble a polka-dotted circus clown, the only toy which has pleased her. The next day Marjorie, playing in the nursery, hears the blare of a brass band in the distance and a moment later the gayly floating banners and gilded wagons of the circus file past the window. Watching for her chance, Marjorie starts out of the house in pursuit of the circus. She is not long gone when she is missed by the nurse, who searches in vain for her. Mr. Herbert then resolves to visit the circus with the possibility of Marjorie having gone there. Arriving at the circus grounds, he inquires his way to Pierro's dressing room, and upon entering finds Marjorie in the clown's arms. In spite of Mr. Herbert's protests, Marjorie refuses to go back to her wealthy home, and Herbert leaves in despair. Pierro and Marjorie left alone are visited by other circus people, who give a rousing cheer for the return of the clown's baby.

THE TWO FUGITIVES (July 29).—After successfully eluding the London police, David Goodwin, an embezzler, sails for America and locates in the West. At the opening of our story, he is married and has several little children, and has become a thoroughly respectable and honorable citizen. One day he is reminded of the past by a newspaper item which states that the London embezzler has been located and that an inspector from Scotland Yard is on his way to arrest him. The scene then changes to a part of the woods surrounding Goodwin's cottage, where a sheriff and posse are pursuing a fugitive cattle rustler, who successfully eludes them and seeks protection with Goodwin. Goodwin is at first inclined to turn him away, but when he thinks that he too has been a fugitive, resolves to protect the man. A few days later, young Manley, Goodwin's guest, has recovered and is invited to remain with the Goodwins, which offer he finally accepts. A week passes, when the inspector from London enters the office of the Chief of detectives in Butte, and makes known the object of his visit to the States. The chief offers him the services of one of his

MELIES CELEBRATES THE FOURTH.

The picture herewith was taken at Santa Paula, California, on the Fourth of July. The occasion was a grand celebration to the town and townsfolk of Santa Paula given by Mr. Gaston Melies, to which people came from a radius of twenty-five miles.

An entertainment, which commenced at ten o'clock in the morning and lasted until daybreak next morning, included races of every description for men and boys, needle and thread races for girls, and a baby parade for the infants. Frolic and fun prevailed all day and all sat down with ravishing appetites to the supper. After dark the town was treated to a lavish display of fireworks, after which a dance was given in the largest hall obtainable. The young stuck it out until dawn.

During the entire day members of the Melies Stock Co. made fun for the crowds in their masquerade costumes, shown above. Mr. Melies gives this celebration every year.

THE MEXICAN JOAN OF ARC (July 31).—Senor Talamantes and his sons are arrested as Insurrecto suspects. Colonel Cephis, of the Mexican regular army, condemns them to death without trial. The Widow Talamantes swears retribution for the unjust death of her husband and sons. Carrying out her plans, the widow organizes a company of Indians and Mexicans and joins the Insurrectos. The Widow Talamantes sends a disguised Insurrecto to Colonel Cephis' headquarters, who induces the Colonel to spend the night in a small Mexican hotel. The next morning Colonel Cephis awakes to find the town in the hands of the Insurrectos. While attempting flight he is ambuscaded by the Widow Talamantes and her little band of Insurrectos and captured. A drum-head court martial quickly condemns him to death. The widow's mission being completed, she returns to her people.

OVER THE GARDEN WALL (August 2).—Carl receives an invitation from his old bachelor uncle to come and make his home at the uncle's country place while he is away on a visit. He warns him against the cranky old maid who lives next door. Miss Tabathia going away to visit her sister, warns her niece, Nellie, to look out for the mean old bachelor next door. Carl arrives with his fox terrier pup. The dog on an exploring expedition locates the cat next door, which he promptly trees. Nellie resents the pup's visit and writes a note to her neighbor, telling him to keep his dog at home. The next morning Carl replies and a quarrel takes place over the garden wall without each other's identity being disclosed. The pup makes another visit. Carl, searching for his dog, discovers he has a charming neighbor. The next day the kitten goes visiting and is returned by Carl with the natural consequence. Carl and Nellie become friends with the usual result, the young people are betrothed.

THE COLONEL'S SON (August 4).—Col. Malcolm drives his dissolute son Dick from his home. Dick goes north and enlists in the Union army. At the same time Col. Malcolm is mustered into the Confederate service. Shortly after the beginning of hostilities Dick is detailed to penetrate the Confederate lines as a spy. He is promptly captured and taken to Confederate headquarters, which happens to be in the tent of his own father. Dick is court-martialed and ordered to be shot. When the death sentence is read Dick trembles like an aspen leaf and shows he is a thorough coward at heart. Col. Malcolm, horror stricken at the terrible position in which his son is placed, still remains loyal to his oath and allows the order of the court-martial to be executed. Seeing the craven spirit of his son he determines to save his honor by telling the boy the bullets will be drawn. Dick believing himself safe, goes to his death with the appearance of bravery.

PEGGY, THE MOONSHINER'S DAUGHTER (Aug. 7).—The Internal Revenue office having repeatedly failed to locate the moonshiner's still in the mountains, calls in a man from another district, who is unknown in the neighborhood. This duty falls on young Hatfield, who is sent into the mountains to locate the troublesome moonshiner. While wandering through the mountains Hatfield meets Peggy, the moonshiner's daughter. Two weeks later Hatfield and Peggy find themselves mutually attracted to each other. Peggy tells her father, Seth Hardy, of the stranger she has met and her father warns her to keep away from him. Hatfield eventually discovers Hardy's still and arranges to capture the moonshiner. Peggy by chance sees Hatfield's badge and learns that he is a revenue officer, but this information comes too late. When Hatfield learns that the moonshiner is the father of Peggy he personally captures Hardy and destroys the still. Then for love of Peggy Hatfield permits Hardy to escape and persuades him to give up the still for his daughter's sake.

AN ACCIDENTAL OUTLAW (July 29).—Jack Snow was held up by an outlaw and robbed of his horse. At a bend in the road he was reloading his sixshooter when it went off, just as a stage-driver was rounding the bend. The bullet hit him in the arm. He halted his horses, and everybody in the stage emptied their pockets, thinking that he was a real bandit. One of the passengers was Dorothy Sherrod, who attracted Jack. He asked her for a flower that she was wearing. She gave it to him. As he was talking with her, the passengers got into the carriage and road away. Jack followed, and the driver, thinking that he was after them, whipped up his horses and soon got out of his range. Later the sheriff was put on his track, but Jack eluded him.

Later Jack's courage was proved when he rescued Dorothy from a band of outlaws, and he made such a bit that the sheriff himself led a movement to have Jack's offense pardoned. One of the most enthusiastic workers in this movement was Miss Dorothy Sherrod, who later became Mrs. Jack Snow.

THE NEW OFFICER (July 31).—Archibald Dumont had just been appointed to the police force. Then he went to sleep and had a dream, in which he made a capture of two desperate criminals. For this, according to his dream, he was immediately promoted to be Chief of Police.

When shown to his beat he was still drowsy and decided to steal a little nap under a bush in the park. While he was snoozing a hobo stole his coat, hat and club. Mr. Hobo had great fun impersonating an officer until he came face to face with two burglars, who promptly dropped their kit of tools and ran away. The hobo was terrified to find himself in possession of the tools. He made several attempts to get rid of them, but in each case some well-intentioned person called his attention to the satchel which he had forgotten. Finally, with a happy thought, he took the tools back and left them beside the sleeping officer. Then the hobo went and told a regular policeman, Riley. This cop didn't know the new officer and he promptly arrested him. Then the happy hobo started out on another pleasure trip. In the course of it he happened into the house where officer Riley's sweetheart lived. Officer Riley came along and saw the hobo policeman kissing his Mary Ann. Of course, he rushed in and gave the hobo a sound trouncing and took him to the station house. Officer Dumont was discharged, but the hobo wasn't. He got ten days.

THE GYPSY (August 3).—A band of gypsies pitched camp on the game preserves of the Hunter family. When informed of this fact by the man in charge, young Bob Hunter decided to go and order them to move on. The chief of the tribe threatened violence and refused to move. In his determination, he was encouraged by his daughter Zara. Bob was much aggravated by her opposition, and at the same time he could not help admiring her. He let the gypsies stay, and came every day to steal a glimpse of the beautiful nomad.

One day after she had tantalized him by crossing a stone wall which he had ordered her not to cross, he capitulated and made friends. Their friendship ripened into love, and he proposed to her. Zara hesitated because of their different stations in life, but finally accepted, although a gypsy lover threatened to make trouble. Bob and Zara were married. After his wife was fitted with stylish apparel, Bob took her home. There he was astonished and disappointed to find that his mother and sister refused to receive his bride.

Poor Zara unfortunately overheard their remarks about her, and too proud to remain where she was not wanted, she again put on her gypsy garments and returned to her father's camp. Bob was nearly distracted when he found that she had gone. He immediately followed her, to find her weeping softly in a secluded corner of the encampment. Zara told him that she could never live among people who did not receive her on terms of equality. So Bob now lives with the gypsies.

AN INDIAN'S APPRECIATION (August 5).—Bill protected a crippled Indian one day from the teasing of Dick, and Dick swore to be revenged. He thought he saw his opportunity when Bill brought a letter to the boss, stating that his brother was dying and was sending his young daughter west to the ranch. When the girl, Edna, arrived, the two cowboys immediately became rivals for her favor. More than once Bill sent Dick about his business when he was annoying Edna with his attentions.

In the fall, the boss found it necessary to take a trip to purchase cattle. Edna asked to go along. Dick, still resentful because his attentions were spurned by the girl, hurried away to the Indian reservation and bribed the Indians to attack the stage-coach. The crippled Indian, whom Bill had befriended, overheard the plot and warned Bill and the cowboys of the intended holdup. So it was that Bill and the boys reached the stage-coach just as the Indians were attacking it. They made short work of the Red Men. Dick was found leading the Indians. The boys were about to string him up, but Edna pleaded for him, and he was driven out of camp in disgrace. Then, of course, the way was clear for Bill.

CAUGHT IN THE ACT (July 31).—A moving picture company is enacting a drama in the country, where an artist, thinking that the altercation is genuine, rescues the heroine. The picture company, finding that they are missing a heroine, start in pursuit of the fleeing rescuer. He arrives at the court a few minutes ahead of the irate producer. Here things are explained, and the hero leaves the court-room in gloom. He was not a hero after all.

THE KNIGHT ERRANT (July 31).—Lady Ettarre, tiring of her young daughter, bargains with the gate-keeper of the castle, who leaves it outside the hut of a charcoal burner. Fifteen years later, instead of having a pleasant life, she is worked hard and mistreated.

The Knight Errant while riding through the forest is attracted by her pleadings for mercy. Yoetta (her name now) is rescued by this stately person, and taken to his home.

Yoetta is now disguised as a Page. In their trip around the world, they come upon Lady Ettarre and her attendant, who are being attacked by brigands. In the struggle that ensues, the Knight is wounded, but is cared for by Lady Ettarre in her castle.

Yoetta is discovered to be a girl, and is sent away to be taken care of by Black John.

Lady Ettarre asks for a token of remembrance. He gives her the little cross that Yoetta gave him when he rescued her. She recognzies the token, and recounts the disposal of the Page. The Knight kills Black John. Lady Ettarre and the Knight are now living happily together.

SAVED BY THE PONY EXPRESS (Aug. 1).—Our first scene shows cowboys and their sweethearts, enjoying a quadrille on horseback. "Happy Jack" rides off with Belle Archer, the sweetheart of Jim. Jim, furiously angry, attacks Happy and the cowboys, taking Jim's pistol from him, hustle him out of the bunk-house. Later the pistol falls to the floor and explodes, the bullet striking and killing Happy, who is alone. The brave fellow writes on a piece of paper before he dies, "I shot myself accidentally, Jack."

A gust of wind blows the note into a corner. Jim entering, is discovered examining his revolver over the dead man, and is accused of murder. Later, we see Jim on trial for his life.

The lame cowboy finds the last message of Happy Jack. He limps out to the road and hands the paper to Jim's friend, the Pony Express rider.

His horse goes lame. He lassoes and mounts an unbroken broncho and is on his way again in a wild dash to save the life of his friend. The jury foreman is about to pronounce the verdict of "guilty," when the spunky rider dashes into the court-room still mounted and delivers the message that proves Jim's innocence. Then a big hurrah for Jim and the Pony Express rider.

THE OLD CAPTAIN (Aug. 3).—The old Captain returns from his voyage and is welcomed by his faithful wife. The mate, a young husky man, is jealous of the Captain, and goes straight to the ship owner's office to knock him. He accomplishes the Captain's discharge. The old Captain breaks the news to his wife, who immediately betakes herself to the office. The old lady goes away disappointed.

The new master cares not for his holiday, but returns at once to the ship, where he proceeds to give orders. The old Captain comes for his clothes, and offers his hand to the new Captain, who shakes it most lamely.

A month later we see the new Captain drunk in his cabin, while a storm is raging. His men are hard at work at the wheel. The mate then rushes to the Captain's cabin and arouses him. The Captain and mate have a fight over the wheel, and, unable to control her, the ship strikes the rocks and is lost. The storm rages on land, and the old Captain comes home and tells his wife of the terrible night, and wonders what may be the fate of his old ship.

From the date of the old Captain's discharge, ill luck stalks like a shadow in the wake of the ship-owner, and from small losses, he suffers the loss of his wife, which almost crushes him. Then the final blow comes in the loss of his ship. He takes at once to the use of cocaine, and a month later finds him not only ruined financially, but a mental wreck as well.

Six months pass and the erstwhile ship-owner falls on the sidewalk in front of the old Captain's home. The couple are on their way from church, and full of kindness they assist him to the house, where they care for him as though he were their own. With no thought of reward, they repay good for evil and are content.

RED CLOUD'S SECRET (Aug. 3)—Philip Armstrong, a young clergyman, was advised to go West for his health. Upon arriving at the Bar X ranch he found a lot of rough looking fellows seated at cards. One of the players, Daley, the leader of the gang, rose and began to put the young Easterner through an initiation. But he went too far when he wrenched a Bible from the young man's hands, and striking the attitude of a preacher, began to read in a sacrilegious manner. Armstrong fought with all his might to recover the Bible, but was overpowered by the bully and fell exhausted to the floor. He was saved from further indignities by the sudden entrance of Doris, the young lady in the town, who commanded every one's respect.

Soon after, Armstrong secured a position as cook. While at the kitchen door, an old Indian stopped and begged a bite to eat. Armstrong gave him plenty, but the poor old redskin did not have a chance to finish, for Daley chanced by and started to beat him up. Now Armstrong by this time had gained strength and when he saw what was taking place, he soon gave Daley his just deserts. From that time on Daley swore vengeance.

In gratitude the Indian gave Armstrong a great secret—the location of a hill rich in gold. The minister went at once with the good news to Doris, from whom he received a promise of marriage. As he left for the promising spot with the Indian, Doris noticed Daley slip by her house. He had heard their conversation as to the location of the mine.

Armstrong found the rich spot and left the Indian on guard while he hurried to file a claim. Daley came and there ensued a fierce conflict between him and the Indian. The latter was nearly overpowered when Doris came to his aid. The two held the brutal man at bay until Armstorng returned. Then followed another struggle between the men, in which Armstrong nearly fell over the cliff. An idea seized the Indian. He grappled with Daley and pushed him over the cliff, but in the struggle went with him.

Armstrong and Doris were horror-stricken, for at the foot of the cliff lay both men, dead. The minister raised both hands to heaven over the dead Indian's body, repeating reverently the words "Greater love hath no man than this, that he lay down his life for his friend."

GAUMONT.

A PASSING FANCY (Aug. 5).—The story opens in the yard of a physician's country home. The doctor and his wife are discovered at afternoon tea when a young aristocrst of the neighborhood is introduced and makes a brief social call, at the close of which he extends to the wife an invitation to attend a hunting meet that is to be held within a few days.

After his departure the husband makes it clear that he does not wish his spouse to attend the meet, and she evidently promises not to do so. However, on the morning of the hunt we see the young neighbor call for her after the physician has started upon his daily rounds.

Various scenes of the hunt are now introduced, in each of which the young man and the physician's wife are much in evidence. By an unfortunate coincidence the doctor happens to pass along a road close to the hunting party and sees his wife with her neighbor. He follows them to the pavilion, at which the many guests are gathered for refreshments, but arrives after his wife has gone into the building in company with some women acquaintances.

Here he quarrels with the interloper and a duel is arranged for a later hour of the same day, but before the time for the encounter the young man is severely injured in a fall from his horse. The doctor is called to his assistance and at first refuses to aid him, but the appeal of professional duty proves so strong that he overcomes his dislike for the injured man and tenders him all aid possible.

EDISON.

CHRISTIAN AND MOOR (Aug. 1).—The love of a Moorish maiden, the daughter of the commander of the army, for a Christian knight, is the basis for the story.

The first meeting of the two lovers takes place at her father's castle, where the armed knight has come to sign the treaty which ratifies the boundary line between the two nations and terminates a long series of battles.

The Moorish chief, a devout believer in his faith, to prove to his enemy the sincerity of the compact, makes a vow before Allah that he will slay, with his own hands, the first persou of his race that breaks the bond aud crosses the boundary line of his domain. After the affairs of state are disposed with, the chief invites his worthy antagonist to remain as a guest of honor in his castle, as becomes the custom of the time. The young knight accepts the invitation and it is ever thus: that he who tarries on his way ofttimes wanders into cupid's snare. The dark eyed maid of noble race looks mysteriously forth from beneath her half veiled face aud Sir Knight forgot not the look nor misunderstood its meaning. Love when veiled is a dangerous art and Sir Knight soon finds himself lingering beneath the balcony of his royal lady love of the soft Southern moon oft looks down upon the old, old story told again to listening ears. But the course of true love rarely runs through green fields and especially if man and maid are of a different race and faith. So it came to pass that the princess had a rival lover, of her own race, who soon spread the rumor that her knight has been fatally wounded in battle. Secretly she steals forth to join him and great is her joy at finding him well. But soon the lovers realize that she has been made the victim of a trick and its awful truth comes upon her when her father discovers that she has broken the treaty—has crossed the boundary line and he is compelled to keep his vow to his God—to slay her with his own hands. The lover hears of her plight and at the head of a gallant army coms to her succor where Crown and Crescent flash in fierce battle array. Love conquers and all ends well.

MONEY TO BURN (Aug. 2).—Hungry Bill lies down on a public park bench for a nap, when the noise of an automobile brings him to his feet.

Approaching the auto, he tells the occupant, a lady, his sad tale of woe, who recognizes him as her long lost brother. Inviting him to ride in her auto, she drives to her banker, where she identifies him as the missing heir of her family and accordingly the banker supplies him with a large amount of money to meet his immediate wants. He loses no time in buying the best outfit of wearing apparel he can find and becomes a howling swell. Finally he decides to indulge in a Turkish bath and hiring a taxi, is swiftly whirled to the desired establishment, where he presents the masseur with a handful of money, demanding the best treatment possible, when he suddenly wakes up to find himself on a bench in the park and a rude policeman ordering him to move on.

THE UNFINISHED LETTER (Aug. 2).—Jasper, the negro janitor of an office building, asks Mr. Brooks, whose office he is cleaning, to write a love note to his sweetheart Lulu, as he cannot write or read. Mr. Brooks, while writing the note, is interrupted by a client. As he is talking with him, Mrs. Brooks drops in, takes a seat at her husband's desk (who is now in his private office), espies the letter, and leaves his office in despair. Just then Mr. Brooks emerges from his private office. He is dumbfounded at the note, and dashes out into the street to find her. However, after much talk, Mrs. Brooks is convinced that the letter is for Jasper, who quietly goes out.

THE SWITCHMAN'S TOWER (Aug. 4).—Bill is a tower man who sets and resets the switches at a junction of the main line. He has a wife and a little girl.

One of the engineers on the road whose headquarters are in the same town, is something of a local sport.

The young wife has occasion to compare the respective incomes of this engineer with her hard working husband to the latter's disadvantage, and the engineer invites her to go with him to the Engineer's Association Picnic. Her husband objects, but she goes anyway. After the train has stopped a little way out for water, she gets out of the train and starts to walk back. In the meantime the good husband has kept to his work and also watched over baby. But he did not notice that it had wandered out of the tower, down to the tracks. The mother finding that both baby and husband are missing, starts out to find them.

The excursion train is now starting for home; the engineer, much put out. Bill switches a freight train on to a siding to leave the main line clear for the excursion train and almost at the same instant discovers that his child is on the main line track. He calls to her from the tower. The engineer on the excursion train discovers the child at the same time and almost at the same instant sees the switch set so that the child's life will be saved but that he and his trainload of passengers will be dashed into the freight on the siding. And then Bill realizes what he has done and covering his eyes with his hands, reverses the switch, knowing the train will pass over the spot where his child is but that the trainload of passengers will be saved.

The train plunges down the track toward the child, who stands with her back to it unconscious of it; but the young mother suddenly appears at the edge of the track and snatching the child from in front of the engine, holds it in her arms a fraction of a second before the iron monster sweeps over the spot.

SIR GEORGE AND THE HEIRESS (Aug. 5).—The young hostess of a house party is detained on the other side of the Atlantic and the party assembles at her mother's house, most of the guests being unknown to that lady. Under these circumstances, Miriam Westover feels that she is perfectly safe in exchanging names and places with her companion, a rather charming young woman, so that incognito, she may get acquainted with Sir George Carrington, a young Englishman whom the matchmaking little friend has invited to meet her. But Sir George being of a cautious turn of mind and fearing the title-hunting American mammas, decides to change places with his own secretary and thus meet the American heiress, in his turn, incognito. When they do meet, each of the secretaries believes that he or she has won the attentions and later the affections of someone of high degree aud on the other hand, each of the other young people believes that he or she has lost a heart to someone of low degree. Finally Sir George overhears his secretary planning an elopement with the young lady who he believes to be Miriam and hastens to his hostess to tell her what is going on. But she and the supposed secretary of the young woman do not take it at all seriously, and he is in a quandary what to do. Then the young daughter of the house arrives and the masqueraders must unmask.

When things are explained it is discovered that the two secretaries are missing, probably preparing for their elopement, and so Sir George proposes that all the guests shall hide in the shrubbery and porches of the house and surprise them. This they do and the elopement begins. The secretary drives up to the gate at the foot of the grounds in an automobile and the girl comes out on the porch to wait for him, little suspecting that she is being watched. Then Sir George proposes to Miriam that they shall slip away from the other guests, leaving them to watch the elopement and that they shall steal the other fellow's automobile and his elopement shall be theirs. Consequently, when this plan is carried out, there is a surprise party all around.

VITAGRAPH.

TWO WOLVES AND A LAMB (July 31).—Doris Kennedy is a young stenographer, who supports a widowed mother—she works for a firm of brokers, Clotz & Bailey, both coarse and illiterate men, and very shady in their business transactions. They overwork her and treat her badly but she is afraid to give up the work on account of her mother.

Clotz & Bailey, through an "ad" in the papers, get hold of Bertie Belknap, a wealthy young man about town, and persuade him to invest money in a bogus concern, expecting to fleece him of all his money.

When Bertie visits the sharpers' office, he is struck by the prettiness and modest manners of Doris, treats her with a kindness and deference that win her heart. He also sees her home one rainy night when he meets her coming from the office.

One evening, a week or two later, she after having left the office for the day, returns there for a book which she forgot. Doris overhears Clotz and Bailey plotting to get Bertie's money, and she at once posts Bertie and warns him. Bertie gets Detective Grant and tells him the circumstances.

The next morning they go to the bank to stop payment on a check Bertie gave the two wolves. Then they make their way to the sharks' office. Bertie is received with open arms by Clotz and Bailey; they present him with papers to sign; Bertie refuses; they try to bully him into the transaction when he summons the detective and has them arrested for fraud. Bertie, thankful to Doris for what she has done, makes her his wife.

THE CLOWN AND HIS BEST PERFORMANCE (Aug. 1).—Little Paul Linton thought he had entered fairy land, when he attended the Sawdus Bros. show with his father and mother. He was particularly fascinated by the funny clown with the little drum, who always stopped before the child and gave a few extra touches to his act in acknowledgment of the boy's appreciation.

At home the boy tried to imitate the grotesque get-up and the comical didos of the ring buffoon, and he fully makes up his mind that when he gets to be a man he is certainly going to be one of those funny fellows, whom he considers in his childish simplicity, the greatest man in the world.

A few weeks later little Paul was taken down with a fever ,and while he lies delirius on a bed of sickness, he is constantly talking of the funny man of the circus. Paul's father and mother and the doctor try to relieve his suffering, and to induce the little fellow to take his medicine, but try as they will he refuses to be comforted or assisted; until they learn, through his wanderings, that there is only one remedy and that is a visit from the clown he saw at the Sawdus Brothers' circus.

Mr. Linton calls on the celebrated fun-maker and asks him, as a special favor, to call on his little son, who craves his presence. The clown consents, and when the boy sees him standing before him, smiles and soon grows better. Before his friend of the circus has taken his departure, the sick child has rested, regained his normal temperature and starts on his way to recovery.

THE PRICE OF GOLD (Aug 2).—It is not surprising when Tom Evans, attracted by the flaring headlines of the discovery of gold in the Yukon, leaves his wife, makes his way to the land of the trail on the shores of Alaska, and plunges with the eager prospectors into the unseen and unpenetrated regions of hidden treasure.

Suffering the acute hardships of a Siberian exile, lured on by an occasional lead or find, which he sends home to his anxious wife, with the promise that he will return in the spring, which never comes, he presses on.

Tom's wife can stand the suspense no longer. If he will not come to her, she will go to him, and, facing the great dangers and the uncertainties of such a trip she perseveres in her search for the man she loves. Weeks pass into months, and she reaches the gold fields and puts up at a shack which is called a hotel. She learns there is a chance to secure a position as a cook at a nearby camp. This offers her an opportunity of securing funds to continue her journey. She applies for the position, is engaged, and overjoyed to find her husband and that he is the owner of the richest claim in the country there.

Tom Evans has paid the price of the gold which he has acquired. He is a crippled invalid from exposure, hard work and privation. He sells his claim to a company of speculators for an immense sum, and returns, with his wife to civilization, enriched in gold, but impoverished in health and spirit.

THE ONE HUNDRED DOLLAR BILL (Aug. 4).—Dick Armstrong is one of the unfortunates who is constantly following the "ad" pages of the daily papers, and being turned down whenever he makes application for a job, because of his shabby appearance and the earmarks of idleness. There is nothing left for him but the bread line and the "hump-back" in the "Hotel du Park." One day, through a stroke of hard luck, he strikes good luck when he bumps into Leonard Seymore, a fat, good natured man about town, who takes Dick to his home, gives him a good feed, and stakes him with a hundred dollar bill. Dick can scarcely believe his good fortune, but braces up with the determination to replace his rags with a respectable outfit that will place him in line for a position and a new start in life.

At the shoe shop, at the clothing store, and even at the quick lunch room, the genuineness of his $100 bill is questioned and refused as an impossible asset for so questionable an owner. Desperate, he forces his way into a swell restaurant, declares his rights as an American citizen, orders a meal, which is served, and then taken away from him when he presents the $100 legal tender in payment. He is suspected of having stolen the bill, and is arrested by the police, called by the proprietor. Dick is taken to the night court and arraigned before the judge.

Leonard Seymore is making a tour of Chinatown and taking in the other sights of the great city. He visits the night court, is recognized by Dick, who points him out as the man who gave him the bill. At once Seymore corroborates Dick's statement. The young fellow is honorably discharged and goes his way rejoicing, with Seymore as his friend.

THE DEATH OF KING EDWARD III (Aug. 5).—King Edward III reigned from 1327 to 1377. He was a son of Edward the Second and he was born at Windsor Castle, November 13th, 1312.

He was celebrated for his wars with the Scottish King and his battles with France. He started the "One Hundred Years' War." In his invasions of France, he was accompanied by his eldest son, "The Black Prince," who was a natural born warrior, and became King after the death of his father.

Edward III in his old age, fell completely under the control of his mistress, Alice Perres and of a small coterie of unscrupulous courtiers. Led by his own son, John, of Galt, Duke of Lancaster, they were constantly plotting against him, at the same time seeking his favor. He became suspicious of everybody but his mistress, who was anxiously watching his death struggles, in order to secure a signet ring which she prized as an evidence of power and a special mark of favoritism.

The moment he becomes unconscious she takes the ring from his finger and leaves him to die alone. She has no sooner gone than all the courtiers and servants rush into the room and strip him of all his belongings. Deserted by all save a young priest, who offers him the consolation of the emblem of the church, he died in 1377, as he had lived, disliked by his people, the victim of the same selfishness which he had practiced himself.

The picture is localized in the King's private room, being performed in one scene; it is a most remarkable historic portrayal on this account and the powerful acting of Mr. Kent.

THE COWBOY'S DELIVERANCE (July 24).—Steve Brody, who never works, lives in the mountains with his wife. He applies for work at V1 Ranch and the foreman employs him. He takes out a bottle of whiskey and offers a drink to Jim Smiley, who refuses to indulge. Brody makes remarks—a fight is averted only by the boys. Shortly afterwards Jim is examining his gun. As Brody leaves the barn the gun is accidentally discharged and Brody pitches forward on his face. The boys find Jim standing over Brody's body with the gun in his hand. Jim then covers the boys with his gun, mounts his horse and gallops away. He is hit with a bullet by the foreman, but manages to escape to Steve's hut, where he tells the wife what happened. She conceals him. The boys arrive and search the house, but are unsuccessful in finding him. Later she goes to the range to seek her husband and finds out that he has been murdered. She starts back to mete out justice, having in her posesssion the broken gun of Jim. When she meets Jim she points the gun in front of Jim's heart and tries to pull the broken trigger, but is unsuccessful. She then faints in the arms of the man she tried to kill.

THE CATTLE THIEF'S BRAND (July 27).—George Mason, part owner of a small ranch in Wyoming, rustles cattle, which is unknown to the employees, with the exception of Jack Beeman, the foreman. Jack Beeman is given a message to George Mason, which he delivers. Mason reads it and throws it down on the ground, which is picked up by his wife, who is shocked at reading: "A ranger is in town looking for cattle. Go slow, Bill." George Mason, finding an unbranded calf, brands it. His wife sees this and is satisfied he is a thief. When he returns she liberates the calf, forgetting that it will seek its mother. Mrs. Mason accuses her husband and tells him what she has done. He then hurries to tell his partner. The wife tells Jack Beeman her story. Jack tells her the ranger must not see the calf, and starts out to rebrand her when he is caught in the act by the ranger. Jack immediately tells him and informs Mason's wife what he has done. In the meanwhile, Mason and his partner quarrel, in which Mason kills the other. He tries to make his escape, but is overtaken and shot. Jack Beeman is then made prisoner. But Mrs. Mason explains that he tried to protect her honor, and is released.

THE PARTING TRAIL (July 31).—Two brothers, Edward and Arthur Halstead, go West, each in different directions, Edward to seek his fortune in the mountains, Arthur to learn the cattle industry. Arthur wins both success and love. He becomes engaged to the ranchman's daughter. Edward becomes the leader of a gang of outlaws and learns that a stagecoach containing a large amount of money is to arrive, which he plans to rob. The ranchman and his daughter are in the coach. The hold-up is a success, but they do not get the money. During the excitement the ranchman tries to draw a gun and falls, mortally wounded. The robbers plan to hold the daughter for ransom. A posse, headed by Arthur, finds the robbers and a battle ensues, in which the two brothers meet. Arthur makes Edward a prisoner and is about to place on handcuffs, when a stray bullet kills Edward. Arthur then tells his sweetheart that the leader was his brother.

THE CATTLE RUSTLER'S END (August 3).—Curley Temple loves the daughter of his employer, Jim Harden.

Fannie Harden, however, has a mind of her own, and arranges to meet Curley, to talk it over, at the lone tree on the prairie.

The ranchman, in looking over his stock, discovers some calves belonging to his herd carrying a brand differing from his own. He accordingly calls the boys together, and offers a reward for the capture of the rustler.

The rustler, one of his own cowboys, meets the cattle thieves in the mountains, and obtains branding irons, and the offer of $5 for every calf he brands. He conceals the branding irons in the tree until such time as he can find to do a little rustling.

Curley arrives at the tree to keep his tryst, and hearing a bunch of the cowboys approaching, conceals himself to avoid their questions, fearing that they may have seen the letter Fannie placed in his saddle. They arrive at the tree and finding his horse, look around for him, and then spying the branding irons left by the rustler, jump to the conclusion that he is guilty, and start a search for him.

Realizing that the boys are apt to be hasty, Curley appropriates the nearest horse at hand, and is in full flight before the cowboys see him. They mount and give chase. When they overtake him he finds that instead of a cowboy joke, he is charged with a serious crime.

In the meantime Bill Peters, the rustler, finding the coast clear, comes to the tree and starts building a fire in which to heat his irons. He is thus engaged when Fannie, coming to keep her appointment with Curley, discovers the rustler.

Fannie realizes she has discovered the rustler her father is looking for, and hurries away to tell her father and the boys. She meets the cowboys, who have captured Curley, and tells them what she has discovered. Releasing Curley, they ride to the tree and capture Peters red-handed. Fannie demands, as a reward from her father, that he give his consent to her union with Curley, and her wish is granted.

THANHOUSER.

THE PIED PIPER OF HAMELIN (Aug. 1).—According to the tale found in the ancient annals, the little town of Hamelin, in Hanover, found itself, five hundred years ago overrun with rats. The citizens tried every way to abate the plague, but without result. Finally a mysterious stranger appeared in the town and offered for the sum of 1000 guilders to clear the place of vermin. His offer was accepted, for the Mayor and Council were at their wits' end, and willing to try any expedient.

The stranger was a piper, and the music he played lured the rats out of their hiding places. They followed him to the river, where they plunged in and were drowned.

When the Piper returned to the Council, and demanded his pay, he found the city rulers ungrateful and dishonorable. They repudiated their bargain, and told the Piper to take 15 guilders and be gone. For he was shabby and ragged and they thought they could swindle him with impunity.

But the Piper had his pipe left, and it was still potent, as the townsmen learned to their sorrow. He played another tune, and this time it was the children who followed him. They marched out of the city behind him, and the citizens awoke to find that all their homes were desolate.

One version of this old legend is that one little boy, a cripple, was unable to keep up with the others, and when they followed the Piper into a hollow hill, he was so far behind that the doorway was closed before he limped up. It is said that he lived a lonely life in a city of sorrow, where the voice of children, except his own, was not heard.

But there is reason to believe that the Piper was not so hard-hearted as some chroniclers have maintained. How could he make a whole town unhappy, ceaselessly unhappy, and how could he blight the existence of a poor little crippled boy? So we like to believe that the Piper listened to the prayers of the cripple, and restored to him his playmates. And that after a time there was joy in Hamelin, and that its citizens learned a lesson, that dishonesty never pays, and that in the long run, if you cheat a man or woman, you may expect some day, in some way, to pay the penalty.

THE JUDGE'S STORY (Aug. 4).—A poor friendless negro stood at the bar of justice, on trial for his life. The evidence was purely circumstantial, but even the lawyer assigned to defend him was skeptical as to his innocence, and indifferent as to the result. The prisoner told a straight story, but others swore that the victim had identified him, in a manner, before he died. The trial proceeded speedily, and the outcome looked black for the prisoner. The aged judge on the bench, who had listened to stories of sordid crimes for years, heaved a sigh of relief when the lawyers concluded their arguments, and started in to sum up. His charge was brief, for there was little he felt called upon to say.

Just as the jurors were preparing to file out, there was an interruption. A feeble old colored woman forced her way through the crowd, and falling on her knees before the judge's bench, implored "Massa Jack" to save her boy.

The judge looked down and recognized her. He showed strong emotion, called the wondering jurors back to their seats, and told them that before they started in to consider their verdict, he wanted to tell them a story of fifty years ago.

At that time a young Confederate officer, while in camp, received word that his mother was fatally ill. He secured leave of absence and started for his old home. It was a trip full of difficulties, because the Union troops were all around that neighborhood, but he managed it somehow, and was in time to receive his mother's dying blessing.

On his trip back the officer was unlucky enough to be seen by the enemy, and was wounded, but managed to elude them. Finally he took refuge in a negro cabin, where a colored woman took him in, cared for him, hid him, and when searchers came denied that he was there.

Her six-year-old boy also did what he could to help the wounded soldier, finally securing him a horse, on which the officer rode away.

As the soldier started off, a Union trooper appeared and called upon him to surrender. But the Confederate, noting that the other was unmounted, put spur to his horse and galloped away. The Union soldier seeing his enemy escaping, knelt and took careful aim at him, but just as he was about to fire, the little negro boy jumped forward, grasped his musket, and struggled to take it from him. There was a shot, and the boy fell wounded. The Confederate would have gone back to his assistance, but other mounted foes appeared, and he saw it would be useless, so he made his escape. After the war the Confederate tried to find the child to reward him, but utterly failed.

"I was the officer," the judge concluded. "The prisoner at the bar was the child who saved my life. Some persons have come forward here to testify to his good character. He says he is innocent of this crime, and I believe him. For a child who would risk his life to save another, could hardly develop into a cowardly assassin."

The jurors agreed with the judge, and when the real slayer was captured later they were glad that they had done so. And the judge saw that the man who had saved his life spent the rest of his days in the happiness and comforts that were surely his due.

ALONE IN THE WORLD (July 26).—A story, in which a little orphaned boy takes up his bundle and goes out into the world. He is unable to secure employment owing to his diminutive stature, and in despair applies to the king for permission to enlist as a soldier. The monarch chaffs him and sends him away, but the boy takes up a spear and follows the army. A sharp engagement takes place, in which the boy is wounded by a stray shot, and an angel descends and wafts the boy up to heaven into the arms of his waiting mother.

ARTFUL TWEEDLEDUM (July 26).—A short comedy, in which Tweedledum becomes involved with the father of his sweetheart and is kicked out, but by a clever plot manages to get into the good graces of the old man again.

BISON.

SILVER WING'S DREAM (July 25).—The Indians are shown preparing for the war, and in the battle that follows, White Bear, the lover of Silver Wing, is terribly wounded. He manages to drag himself away from the scene of carnage and to the bank of a stream, where he falls unconscious. That night Silver Wing has a vivid dream, in which she sees her wounded lover, and awakening, goes to the scene of battle and searches till she finds him. She bathes the wounded warrior, reviving him, and half carries him to the camp. When he has recovered he is made chief of the tribe in place of the leader, who has fallen in the battle, and Silver Wing is wed to him in a unique ceremony.

THE TABLES TURNED (July 28).—Mary's father is persuaded by a bad companion to steal a couple of horses. Joe, an unsuccessful suitor, sees the theft, and threatens to expose him unless Mary marries him. Jim, her lover, plays a clever trick on Joe by tracing the horses and buying them from the horse dealer. He returns them to the shed from which they were stolen, and Joe, thinking Mary's father has brought them back, takes them away to hide them. He is caught in the act and arrested by the sheriff. Mary's father then confesses to the ranch owner, who forgives the offense and persuades the sheriff to drop the case. Joe is driven away, and Jim and his sweetheart are wed.

RELIANCE.

THE TWO MOTHERS (July 22).—Belle is engaged as governess for little Marjorie, by the wealthy Lorimers. George Lorimer comes home from college and the young people fall in love and are secretly married. He goes back to his studies, and finally, unable to conceal her marriage any longer, Belle implores him to come home. Mrs. Lorimer surprises Belle in her room sewing on baby clothes and sends her away, and the girl goes back to her old mother, where a pathetic scene takes place. George comes home, but is forbidden to see his wife on pain of being disowned. Little Marjorie dies and Mrs. Lorimer is on the verge of insanity. George decides on a bold stroke, and goes to his wife, and persuades her to come to his home. Her tiny baby is placed in Mrs. Lorimer's arms, and as the baby fingers twine about her, George's mother impulsively strains it to her breast and kisses her daughter-in-law. Mr. Lorimer, taking in the scene, repents his stern action and forgives his son with a glad heart.

THE CALL OF THE SONG (August 3).—Hugh Norton and Amy Gordon are sweethearts residing in a village. Hugh receives an offer to enter the office of a business firm in the city. He hastens to Amy to inform her of his prospects, and takes leave of her in her rose garden.

Hugh goes to the city, and mingles with the fast set. Amy sends him a pair of slippers that she has embroidered with his initials. He receives them just as he is entertaining his blasé friends. The package is opened, but tossed aside.

In the meantime, Amy visits the postoffice every day, awaiting news from her sweetheart. At school she reads the engagement of Hugh to a wealthy city woman. The shock is too much for her; it turns her brain.

At a dinner, surrounded by his companions, a street singer appears and sings, "With the Last Rose of Summer, I'll Come Back to You." Hugh listens. In an instant it all comes back to him. He rushes out of the place, and denounces the woman to whom he is engaged.

He journeys to his home town, but is ostracized. At her mother's home, she points to the rose garden. He finds her there in a demented stage. He sings their favorite song: "With the Last Rose of Summer, I'll Come Back to You." She listens; her reason gradually returns, and is clasped in his arms.

THE SKATING BUG (July 31).—Convict No. 34 makes his escape from prison by scaling the wall and, dropping outside, casts about for a means of a speedy getaway. He espies a dude about to engage in the pastime of roller skating on the pavement. The convict is desperate, also resourceful, and in a jiffy he has appropriated the skates and swapped costumes with the ladylike young man. Once on the skates the criminal shows his familiarity with the footgear by gliding rapidly away. The alarm is given and the escaped prisoner is chased, and chased closely. He has many mishaps, throwing his pursuers off the trail and eluding them by skillful manœuvres and piling them up on the walk and in the street. Hotly pressed, he skates off a dock into the water and the chasers, unable to check their momentum, take impromptu baths, the scene producing material for screams of laughter. The dude is captured and locked up only to be released when the convict is finally captured and restored to his cell.

THE BI-CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION AT MOBILE, ALA. (July 31).—Striking scenes in the recent celebration at Mobile, Alabama, showing the development of a Southern city and the enterprise shown in furnishing the fête event. Soldiers and civic societies participate in street pageants, in glittering spectacles, the whole combining to make a film of interest from scenic and historical standpoint. The celebration was attended by an immense crowd and was one of the biggest events ever held in the South.

SOLAX.

THE DOUBLE ELOPEMENT (July 26).—Jim and May are engaged to be married, but fearing that their parents will refuse to give their consent on account of their youth, decide to elope. It so happens that Jim's father and May's mother have fallen in love with each other, and they, too, fearing that their children would not think well of their plan, decide to elope. Unfortunately, both couples chose the same night to elope.

Jim secures an old horse and buggy, and getting May he drives to the minister. As they stand before that reverend gentleman and are about to be married, they are startled to hear the approach of an auto. As it stops just in front of the minister's house, Jim looks out of the window and is astonished to see his papa and May's mamma approaching the house. Thinking the old people are on to their game, Jim and May make a hurried exit through the rear window and jump into papa's car just as that worthy is going into the parsonage with his prospective bride. Papa is no sooner in the parsonage when he hears the chug-chug of his auto. Jim has decided to be on his way in the faster vehicle. Papa rushes out and he and mamma pile into the dilapidated buggy and give hot pursuit.

The old people finally overtake Jim and his girl. The auto has broken down and we see Jim's feet sticking out from underneath a machine, while he vainly tries to put the engine to rights. Papa, greatly excited, and feeling sure that he has now got the thief to rights, jumps out of his slow, but as it proved, much more dependable vehicle, and pulling the person by the feet from underneath the auto, is astonished to see his own son's face. After explanations are offered and everything is made right, the happy four take their way back to the parsonage, where a double wedding is soon in progress.

OUTWITTED BY HORSE AND LARIAT (July 28).—A crowd of cowboys is lolling about in front of Casey's saloon, amusing themselves with feats of horsemanship and lariat throwing. Among those is little May, the rose of the ranch, and who is dear to the hearts of all the big manly boys. But as she mingles freely among her friends she is approached by Bill, the bully of the town. As he seizes her in his grasp and endeavors to kiss her he is surprised to receive a stinging blow. Turning angrily about he faces his opponent, who proves to be Jack Freeman, a very popular boy of the ranch. The men face each other for a moment and then like a flash Bill draws his gun and is about to shoot Jack when Ned, one of Jack's friends, seeing the danger in which his friend is placed, throws his lariat and catches Bill's hand just as it is descending with the gun.

In a thrice they have Bill tied up and after bouncing him up and down in a blanket, finish his treatment by dousing him in the horse trough.

After they release Bill he swears revenge, and going to a camp of Mexican renegades, he enlists their aid. They wait by the roadside, and as May passes on her way home, they spring out and carry her away to their stronghold, back in the mountains. Many miles away from friends, and securely tied to a tree, she is about to lose all hope when an idea enters her head. Taking a leaf from a nearby bough, and with a hairpin piercing in its surface a message for help, she sticks the leaf in her horse's bridle, and sends him back to the camp. As the faithful horse gallops into the camp he is surrounded by the cowboys, who after a short examination, discover the leaf with the message.

Quickly saddles and bridles are brought forth and the small party is off to the rescue. As they near the rendezvous the boys stay back while Jack, May's lover, approaches with his horse. As he cautiously raises his head above the tall grass he is horrified to see May tied to the tree surrounded by the desperate men, who are discussing her. Jack quickly makes up his mind what to do. Jumping into the saddle he whips his horse into a whirlwind gallop, and dashing right into the renegades' camp, he picks the girl from the ground and is off before a shot can be fired. The Mexicans quickly lose the trail of the daring American boys, and they return to camp, where things look as if there would be a wedding very soon.

LUX.

BILL BUYS A BOTTLE OF CHAMPAGNE (July 28).—Bill sets out to buy a bottle of champagne. The transaction being satisfactorily accomplished, he remembers that he does not possess a corkscrew, and consequently he requests the wine merchant to remove the cork for him. This done, Bill places his finger to the mouth of the bottle and departs upon his homeward way. As may be imagined, before he has gone very far he discovers that the improvised stopper is resulting in a leakage of champagne, and, in investigating matters, he lets fly a tremendous volume into the faces of passers-by. This occurs on several occasions, until poor Bill finds himself once more involved as the quarry in a wild comedian hunt. After numerous narrow escapes, he throws off his pursuers and sits down by the roadside to rest. Sleep overcomes him, and two robbers take advantage of his somnolence to run through his pockets. But Bill recovers his senses just in time, and removing his fingers from the bottle, he drenches the thieves with wine and puts them to flight. Stumbling wearily onward with the bottle clutched to his bosom, he eventually reaches his home, and, with the delightful simplicity which always characterizes him, sits down on the doorstep to sample the precious liquor. His surprise and dismay are quite pathetic when, on taking his finger from the aperture, he discovers that not a drop is left!

JIM CROW: A TALE OF THE TURF (July 28).—Mr. Derval, the owner of Farandole, reads in a sporting newspaper that Jim Crow is a certain winner for the Grand Prix d'Auteuil, and that his own horse is only second favorite. An inspection of Jim Crow, both on the course and at close quarters, convinces him that the prophesy is a safe one, and that his own animal stands no chance of the coveted victory. So dearly does he desire the prize that the idea of foul play enters his mind when he realizes fair means to be useless. He writes a note, under an assumed name, to Jim Crow's trainer, making an appointment at his hotel. The man having arrived, Derval offers him $3,000 if he will prevent the favorite from winning. The proposition is at first indignantly refused, but the trainer is a poor man, and eventually succumbs to the great temptation. That night he doctors the horse's food. The next scene takes place on the morning of the great race. Jim Crow's jockey is suddenly taken ill, and his place is filled at the last moment by the son of the trainer. We then witness the historic contest itself. All goes well until the last fence, when Jim Crow, who has hitherto been romping to victory, comes crashing to the ground, and his rider falls beneath him, sustaining the most terrible injuries. The scene in the hospital ward follows, when the anguished father realizes by the jockey's death-bed that he has killed his own son. The agony of his remorse causes him to inform against Derval, who is summarily arrested in the midst of his celebrations of victory.

NESTOR.

THE SETTLER'S WIFE (July 26).—It was at the stage-coach station that Fanny Stanley first met the fascinating stranger, who was destined to play such an important part in her life.

How gallantly he had opened the coach door for her; with what ease he had ingratiated himself with her husband, and later entertained them with brilliant and amusing sallies—oh, so different from her hum-drum, commonplace John, and Fanny glanced with annoyance to where he stood bargaining for a prairie schooner. How sincerely she hoped that the man would not sell, for that would mean losing sight of Miles Kirby, her interesting stranger! In this, however, she was doomed to disappointment; John had purchased the schooner, and was already making inquiries regarding a possible location for their cabin.

Perhaps Mr. Kirby would act as their guide, a suggestion which not only found instant favor with the stranger, but her husband as well. After a location had been selected, at their guide's suggestion their tent pitched and supper eaten, Kirby, unable to find any further excuse for delay, was forced to mount his horse, which he had secured at the stage station, and ride away. Before he departed, however, he had observed that his hostess, taking care that he, and not her husband saw her, had glided out into the night. The man was not surprised, therefore, upon finding her a short distance away, leaning against a large tree, very much astonished, of course, that he should be coming that way, and although his advances were repulsed that night, there was a challenge in her smile and manner which bid fair to bring him success at some future time.

The husband's hearty invitation to call gave Kirby an opportunity to see her again and again—for dear, hospitable John Stanly, was only too pleased that his young wife should find their new friend agreeable and entertaining. Indeed, it was not until he found her note, stating that she had gone away with the man she loved, that the broken-hearted husband realized his blindness.

Snatching up his rifle, he soon overtook the guilty pair, and had not Fanny thrown herself between them, pleading for her lover's life, he would probably have killed Miles Kirby, then and there; as it was, after warning Kirby to treat the woman fairly, he commanded them to go. No sooner was the husband gone, however, than Kirby turned to the woman—John Stanley really loved his wife—she had lied to them both: so deaf to her entreaties, he told her to go back to her husband, mounted his horse and rode away. Finding there was naught else for her to do, Fanny staggered to her feet and slowly dragged herself toward the cabin; but instead of the little home which John had endeavored to make attractive for her sake, she found only a blazing furnace of logs, for John had quickly packed up his belongings, set fire to the cabin, and driven away. So the miserable woman found herself alone in the wilderness with naught, save the dismal howling of the wolves to bear her company.

MUTT AND JEFF MAKE A HIT (July 29).—The rent had long been due in the "diggings" of Mutt and Jeff, and many requests for settlement were made to no avail. Finally the patience of Mrs. Payme was exhausted, and when she met the two coming down the stairs, she only had to call to them, to make clear her wants. "I'll let Jeff do it!" says our old friend Mutt, as he sneaked outside while little Jeff went in the direction from which the call came. "She says, 'Room rent today, or git;'" and he added, "Two actors want our room!" "Why, the sassy cat!" replies Mutt—then as if struck by the thought—"We'll be actors, too!"

A billboard on which appears a large "ad." for "Gold Dust Twins," furnishes the idea to complete the stage career for Mutt and Jeff. They are seen in the hooking offices of Bill Gash, where they were directed by a stage hand of one of the theaters visited, and after a few moments in conversation, Mr. Gash comes to the conclusion that he has a big "find" for the regular Friday Night Amateur Contest at The Tryum.

The road to fame is indeed very "rocky" for Mutt and Jeff, and finally when the eventful night comes around, and they realize that they are now before a real live audience, it is with great difficulty that either can recall the "routine" so long rehearsed. After many attempts to regain their composure, as well as their voices, Mutt comes to the rescue (?) with "Has Anybody Here Seen Kelly?" which is the signal for the presentation of all the "bouquets"—not of flowers—but cabbage, turnips, corn, lemons, etc. As hard as it was to get started, it is now just as hard to stop "The Gold Dust Twins," so the always reliable "hook" is called on to do the trick!

Poor Mutt and little Jeff soon find themselves outside the stage door! "It's your fault, you big stiff!"—"Not a bit of it, you shrimp!" Such is the brotherly arbitration heard by the "cop" on that beat, as he comes up and says, "What the divil yer call this?" After hearing their plea, he decides, "Yer can't get far widout clothes! Ye'd better come along wid me!" Such is the fate of poor Mutt and Jeff's first and last attempt at a great stage career! As we see them behind the bars, awaiting to "tell it to the Judge," we hear Mutt and Jeff earnestly, though faintly, remark, "Anyhow, we made a hit!"

ECLAIR.

THE PRODIGAL SON (July 31).—The Eclair Company's offering represents the Biblical story in all its original beauty and realism and was staged with great regard for detail.

Contrasting the sweet peace and quietude of the home with the gay, city life "where he wasted his substance in riotous living" the evil results of sin and disobedience wherein we find a son and wanderer, suffering from hunger and distress, until realizing the great error of his ways he determines to lead a new and holier life; then closing the story with scenes of the boy's return, his father's goodness of heart and the feast of joy which followed and we have a faithful and truly powerful rendition in motion tableau of one of the Bible's best dramas.

THE SORROWFUL MOTHER (August 7).—Seeking to obtain by force the love of a pretty widowed mother who has repulsed him, Antone, a fisherman, secretes the child she loves devotedly in the forest, securely confined in the meshes of one of his nets.

The brute then returns to the distracted mother and demands she marry him on pain of losing her child.

Meanwhile, the plucky lad patiently struggles with his bonds until he contrives to escape. Returning to his home he hears voices raised in anger and fear. Through the window he sees his mother struggling in the arms of Antone.

Summoning help, the boy succeeds in having the ruffian punished.

TOO MUCH SWEDISH DRILL.—The entire community was worked up over the miraculous cure of one Mr. Sleeper through the new Sweedish Drill. Shrimp, a lifelong friend of Sleeper, becomes an ardent devotee of the new hobby and proceeds to practice the drill at all hours of the day and night, much to the annoyance of every one.

CHAMPION.

THE PERILS OF A WAR MESSENGER (July 31).—The mission that Joe undertook was hazardous in the extreme—an incursion into and through the Federal lines, right into the city of Washington, for the purpose of obtaining the plans for the manufacture of gun caps, the most useful destructive commodity. The Confederates were sorely in need of them, and especially the Army of Northern Virginia.

The Confederate Secretary of War had ordered the venture and Joe was fulfilling it. He hid in hay stacks, pilfered the guns of sleeping sentries, was pursued and shot at, escaped detection under the noses of pursuers, while secreted in a fireplace, covered with ashes. In the last ruse he was aided by a sympathetic maid.

On the field of battle, a dying youth entrusts Joe with a ring for his sister at home. This girl is the daughter of a man who had befriended Joe, and he therefore gladly accepts the service, also for the sake of the lost brother.

When he had successfully accomplished the great mission he set out upon, and brings back and places the plans in the hands of the secretary, he was awarded the commission of captain for his valliant services. But he refused it.

When he returned to that sweet faced girl who had won his love, we rejoice in the bliss and happiness which must come to him, for he was deserving of it all.

THE DUBUQUE REGATTA (Aug. 2).—This picture of motor craft is so wonderfully and thrillingly shown, that one is struck with amazement at the daring of those who must have faced the greatest of peril in order to have accomplished the herculean task of such startling depiction. The famous Disturber 2nd and Hoosier Boy and a host of others, go dashing by.

Now flashing by comes the Hydroplane, well named indeed, for it skims along the waves seeming to leap from crest to crest in its terrific flight. But there are hundreds and hundreds of others and that great twenty-mile course is dotted with them. Among the many renowned men of the aquatic world gathered at this regatta, is Commodore Pugh of Chicago, owner and chief pilot of the Disturber 2nd.

As the celebration was classed as a Water Carnival, and the town of Dubuque was dressed in holiday attire, very fine pictures were obtained in the making of the whole event.

HER WAY (July 27).—Mr. and Mrs. Graham have arranged to go to the opera, but at the eleventh hour Mrs. Graham gets a headache, and persuades her husband to go himself. Mr. Graham leaves, for the train to take him to town and the opera, but misses it by a few moments. So he returns home, returns home to discover his wife's infidelity. He sees her in the garden with Mr. Norton, his neighbor. He realizes that she has feigned illness to be home just for this purpose; in anger and pain at the sight, his first impulse is to kill both, and he goes into the house to obtain his revolver. While on this errand, however, he meets his little daughter, just about to retire, and stops to chat with her. The child, in their talking, enters the heated heart and calms it. He remembers, suddenly, that the false woman is this child's mother, remembers many little things which in his rage had no place in his mind, and he determines to follow a different course in meting out punishment to the sinners. Norton has ruined his home, he will ruin Norton's. So he goes to Mrs Norton and tells her of her husband's infidelity, tells her he is determined to wreak vengeance upon the tempter, and that she has but one alternative of preventing his shooting her husband on sight. She must elope with him within an hour. The woman, suffering from the blow caused by her husband's faithlessness, acts like a true heroine. Her heart rankling at the thought of his deceit, she is still true woman enough to sacrifice herself for his well-being. She consents to meet Mr. Graham in an hour.

Norton returns home, and is met by his accusing wife, who demands to know where he has been. He sees at once that the woman has more than mere suspicions, and he confesses all. The moment is a tense one—it is just fifteen minutes to the hour allotted by Graham. She must meet him within fifteen minutes, or her husband pays the penalty for his transgression, the last penalty he would ever pay for any misdeed. She tells her husband to go upstairs to get something for her, and while he is gone, dons his clothes and walks out on the veranda. Graham, waiting some distance away, has seen the hour go by, and he concludes that Mrs Norton has changed her decision. When he sees what is apparently the figure of Mr. Norton on the veranda, he is true to his word—and shoots. As the bullet strikes her, the hat falls from her head, and Graham realizes his mistake. The Providence that directs matters in this world sees to it that the heroine loves, and when Norton realizes the sacrifice his wife has made for him there is born a love for her that verges on worship.

POWERS.

LAST OF THE MOHICANS.—Magua, a worthless, treacherous chief, is expelled from his tribe and becomes a guide in the army. His drunkenness causes him to be lashed and drummed from the fort. He endures the punishment with Indian-like stolidity and bides his time to be revenged upon Major Monroe, who ordered him flogged. Soon after Magua is hired at another fort. Judge of his delight when he finds his first mission is to guide his enemy's two beautiful daughters to their father. He arranges a trap from which they are rescued through the heroism of Hawkeye, Chingachgook and Uncas, the last of the Mohicans. Magua is wounded, but escapes, and, rallying a large war party of Iroquois braves, he leads them close upon the track. They capture the two girls, David, their singing teacher and Duncan Heyward, a gallant officer. Magua tells Cora Munroe that her father had him flogged and that she must become his squaw. He promises if she will do so, he will free Heyward, David and Alice, her younger sister. Cora agrees to the sacrifice, but the sister will not listens Heyward is goaded to frenzy by Magua's infamous proposition, and so insults him that the infuriated Indian gives orders for a massacre. As the tomahawks are suspended over the brave prisoners, shots are heard and a detachment of troops, headed by the Scout Hawkeye and Major Monroe, fall upon the savages and conquer them. Uncas, the brave Mohican warrior, has a hand to hand fight with Magua. Uncas receives his death wound and perishes, the last of the Mohicans. The girls are restored to their father, but the general happiness is clouded with sorrow, for all have grown to respect the brave boy who perished for them.

SPECULATION.—Some unprincipled promoters go to a small rural village and incite interest in a questionable company they have formed. The innocent villagers invest heavily and the two decide to leave after an attempt to get a large sum of money from Judge Hoskins, the richest man in the town. It is difficult to convince the careful old judge, but the plausible promoters finally persuade him to invest. He mortgages his property and is about to plunge with his all, when his daughter, who has vainly tried to dissuade him, makes a pathetic appeal to the younger swindler, and he, unable to resist her pleadings, tells her the scheme is worthless. He leaves town a discredited adventurer. The gullible countrymen are dumbfounded by this desertion and believe their investment lost. At length some of the bolder spirits seize the helm and work hard to retrieve the loss. Judge Hoskins still believes in the company and again mortgages his lands and home and plunges with the enterprising spirit of a Wall Street lamb. It is an uphill fight, but their hard labor is gradually rewarded with success. It is soon made manifest that instead of the countrymen being behind the times, they were ahead of them. The swindler, who has reformed, returns to take a last farewell of the daughter, and is surprised to see the enterprise successful. He is finally rewarded with the girl's affections.

GREAT NORTHERN.

THE ENGAGEMENT RING (July 29).—A fisher lad and his lass are seen walking along the beach washed by the incoming tide. They have quarreled, as lovers sometimes do, and to give force to her decision to end everything between them, the wilful maiden takes the engagement ring from her finger, and throws it into the sea. Arriving home, the girl is visited by a once-rejected suitor to her hand, who notices the absence of the engagement ring, and is inspired with fresh hope. The young lady is meanwhile racked with remorse, and is love-sick. The rival, meanwhile, goes fishing, and amongst his catch is a fine piscatorial specimen, inside the mouth of which he finds the ring. At the village tavern he plays cards, and wins from the rejected lover the emblem of his troth, given him by the girl. He now has two rings, much to the chagrin of the other man, who follows him when on a fishing expedition, determined to get the ring back. At sea they quarrel and fight and fall overboard, and to save his own life, the rival has to let the rejected lover drown. On returning to shore, he is accused of murder, but the good character which is given him by a friend, saves him, and by the instrumentality of the same friend, he is enabled to win his bride.

YANKEE.

THE SEA VULTURES (July 31).—When the wreckers of this story had completed their dastardly work of luring and wrecking a ship upon the rocks, they began looking among the wreckage for valuables. Although there was not enough left of the ship that would sustain life on an angry sea, the wreckers were surprised to find among the wreckage, a young baby, who came through the ordeal safe and sound, watched and guarded by the Higher Power and All-Seeing Eye.

The wrecker captain, hardened as he was, could not resist the unconscious appeal of the innocent little life, and with a tenderness not attributed to his calling, he takes the babe and adopts her as his own, lavishing all the love of his pent-up nature upon her.

The child grows to beautiful womanhood and in spite of her environment, becomes a sweet, womanly girl, beloved by the reckless and lawless companions of her father. Her beauty, noble character and sweet, womanly ways, gradually softens the heart of her adopted father and when the opportunity presents itself, at her pleading and for her sake, he begins his life of reformation.

This does not suit his former companions, who do not cease luring unsuspecting ships upon the rocks with their false beacons, until caught and apprehended by the government. The revenue officials, led by a brave Yankee officer, find the home of the wreckers among the rocks of the dangerous coast. Amid these surroundings the revenue officer meets the adopted daughter of the wrecker captain, and learns from her of her father's desire to reform.

With information furnished by her and her adopted father, he captures the gang of wreckers, after a hazardous chase among the dangerous rocks and reefs. Young, beautiful and sweet, the daughter of the wrecking captain charms the revenue officer, and before he leaves the scene of his recent victory, he wins her for his wife.

First 24-sheet Picture Poster.

The Monopol Film Company claims the distinction of being the first to issue a 24-sheet poster to advertise a motion picture. The engraving herewith was made from the big poster which will advertise the coming of that great production, "Dante's Inferno." 'Tis just a bit of evidence of this company's enterprise.

TRUTH SHALL PREVAIL (Aug. 4).—The mother, with her son, visits an old friend of her husband's in hopes that she may secure a position for her boy in his office. The boy meets with the gentleman's approval and is engaged as a stenographer.

In the office is a young man who has been living beyond his means. He robs his employer of a sum of money, and to throw suspicion from him, places some of the money in the boy's desk. The employer discovers the loss of the money, a detective is called and in his search the detective finds the money in the boy's desk. The boy is accused of the crime, he protests his innocence, to no avail. His employer decides that the law must take its course, the boy is arrested. The mother learns of her boy's arrest, she goes to the employer and pleads with him to spare her boy. Her pleadings are in vain. The employer declares he can do nothing toward freeing her son, he has committed a crime and should pay the penalty.

The guilty clerk is troubled with a guilty conscience and takes relief from his troubled thoughts by excessive drinking. While walking across a street he is hit by an automobile and injured. The accident occurs in front of the boy's mother's home. He is carried in the house and taken care of by the boy's mother. He has been treated so kindly by the mother that he decides the boy shall suffer no longer. He makes a confession of his crime on the strength of which the boy is released from jail.

The employer expresses his regret of having dealt with the boy so harshly, reinstates him in the office in a higher position.

In the meantime the guilty clerk has recovered from his injury. The boy's mother begs the detective who is to take the clerk to jail, to allow her to take the clerk to the employer's office. She decides to plead with the employer in the clerk's behalf. The mother ,with the detective and clerk. come to the office, she realizes that the employer has decided that the clerk shall be punished, but hopes to soften the employer's heart. The employer remains firm and the clerk is taken away to jail.

ANGELL WRITES TO ME:

Customers don't take the trouble to sit down and write a letter of appreciation unless they're doggone well pleased. Now, for instance, take a slant at this dandy letter received by my Minneapolis office from Mr. Hans Angell, manager Lyceum Theatre, Thief River Falls, Minn.:

"I wish to express my appreciation of the films which you have been sending us recently. I know that Mr. Morgan (proprietor of the Lyceum) is more than satisfied with them. We are doing very nicely. If you continue sending us stuff like the last six or seven changes we will have the opposition house put out of business in less than a month."

That letter was written right in the very midst of the boiling hot weather. How many of you were "doing very nicely" at that do the nicest possible business time? And if you really want to why in Tophet don't you write to me?

MAKE 'EM YOURSELF SLIDES

Make them yourself. Written with pen and ink or typewriter. Three minutes to make a slide. Used for advertising slides, to announce future or feature programmes, for chorus slides when chorus slide is missing. We send four colors of gelatin. The slides look well and any one can make them. They are handy also for announcing vaudeville acts. In fact they may be readily used for anything you may wish to say to your audience.

For the sum of three dollars ($3) cash with order, we will send by express, charges not prepaid, the following:

24 cover glass, 1 package binder strips, 1 dozen mats, 1 instruction sheet, 1 form sheet and 50 strips assorted colors gelatin—enough for from 300 to 400 slides. Order now. Address

Do Not Be Tempted To Buy Something Cheaper On The Maker's Recommendation That It Is As Good As The "Hallberg Standard Economizer." My "Economizer" has delivered the goods for over four years; all other makers are constantly changing their designs in an effort to make them "As good as the 'Hallberg.'" Do you get the Point? A Few Dollars that you may save by purchasing the cheaper device now, only means extra expense later, when you come to me to exchange your "nearly as good" for a "Hallberg Economizer." Here is a sample:

Syracuse, N. Y., Jan. 10, 1911.

Mr. J. H. Hallberg:
Dear Sir:—The "Hallberg Economizer" works fine. Gives a better light in every way, and my light bill is less than with the "other current saver" which I returned to you.

Yours sincerely,
E. W. Logan, Mgr. Star Theatre.

KEEP YOUR DRUM HEADS DRY

The very nature of drum heads causes them to absorb moisture readily, and when the heads become damp it is an absolute certainty that your drum will lose its brilliancy.

Our latest invention, the Electric Drum Heater, entirely overcomes this difficulty, for by its use you can keep your drum brilliant and snappy regardless of the weather.

This device can be attached to any drum and the connecting plug will fit any ordinary 110-volt incandescent lamp socket. It gives no light; never burns out; may be turned on and off at will, or if desired, entirely removed in a few seconds time. Entire outfit, including the Heater proper, two connecting plugs, and six feet of cord, weighs eight ounces—the Heater but two. It is practically indestructible and can easily be carried in your drum case.

Be sure and say whether you wish it for Snare Drum, Bass Drum, or Tympani, as each instrument requires a different strength.

Try one—your money back if you are not entirely satisfied

Mr. Exhibitor:

WE are able to sense the mental impression you have been holding for weeks and weeks as regards the National Programme, so, too, we are able to understand your interest and desire for full information; now that we have come upon facts:

THE LONG-ANTICIPATED ANNOUNCEMENT OF READINESS TO SERVE—we know in advance that question upon your lips, and we answer that we hold a satisfying reply—QUALITY, in every foot we will release.—— Of our American films let us say that nothing will be lacking, in that each producer will devote himself to productions of CHARACTERISTIC SUBJECTS, subjects which environment and natural conditions fit them to handle; namely, The Western Drama; all ability and energy will be devoted to carefully working out of this type of drama. In our foreign production, we believe that the supplies of the trade awaits the public in the line we are importing. Never in the history of human endeavor was so much power, conviction, technical skill and dramatic conception combined in a product.—

American brains and the matchless climate of European countries have been injected into our foreign productions.—A Sarah Bernhardt has been able to win the applaudits of American audiences before; that power, that spark of personality with which her every effort before the footlights seems endowed, cannot have died out, and our products from foreign shores carrying the efforts of stars of the first magnitude must win recognition and support. Such we pledge to give you; such you will be asked to ally yourself with, and we are going forward with the conviction that the National Programme embodying these things with the exclusive idea must carry us as well as yourselves to the front ranks.

Our programme consists of the exclusive products of the following manufacturers:

Mono Film Co., Paris.
Film d'Art, Paris.
Acquila Film, Turin, Italy.
Savoia Film, Turin, Italy.
Helios Film, Rome, Italy.
Latium Film, Rome, Italy.
Mondia Film, Paris.

Rose Manufacturing Company, Indiana.
Federal Film Co., Mass.
Washington Film Co., Washington.
Mohawk Film Co., South Dakota.
Oklahoma Producing Company, Oklahoma.

WOLGAST-MORAN FIGHT

Held at Coffroth's Arena, San Francisco, July 4, 1911. World's championship—first international championship battle in 20 years. Wonderful picture, showing every blow and action in desperate and fiercely-fought contest, ending in knockout in 13 rounds. Three reels—2,600 feet film—unanimously conceded to be greatest fight pictures ever taken. For particulars, wire, write or phone,

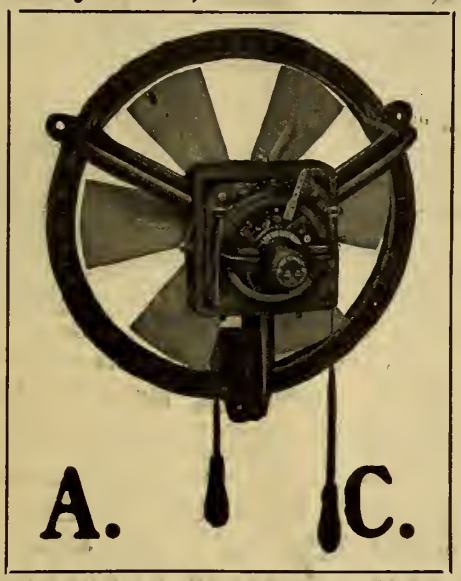
Good Gracious! Isn't that Kimble Fan in yet?

You haven't a tenth of an idea what a luxury you are missing, or how much money you are losing by delaying this important matter this way.

Get Busy Now, and "Get Next."



Honestly: The Kimble fans are exactly the fans you need and should have.

Because they are instantly reversible, from intake to exhaust, or the reverse.

Because you can run them fast or slow, to suit conditions, and the slower you run them the less your power bill.

Because they cost less to buy and cost less to operate, in proportion to the amount of air moved, than any other fan.

Because they are the only fans that will do these things, and the only fans that are sold under a 2-year guarantee.

Sizes—Capacities—Prices.

Fan Diameter	Horse Power	Cu. Ft. Air per Minute	Weight, Crated	Net Price, F.o.b. Chicago
18 in.	1/6 h.p.	2,500	115 lbs.	$65.00
24 in.	½ h.p.	6,000	216 lbs.	90.00

42 in.	2 h.p.	22,000	635 lbs.	275.00

Above prices are for our straight-blade fans complete with motors, 110 or 220 volts, 60 cycles, alternating current.

Still Running your M. P. Machine by Hand ?

Too bad! You don't know what you are missing! Think of it! A little ⅛-H.P. motor that costs and that will run your machine noiselessly, smoothly, and give your picture more delicate shadings of expression than any operator can do by hand.

$27.00 for 110 volts.
28.50 for 220 volts.

And, of course, it leaves the operator's hands free to handle his light and permits him to do a lot of "stunts" that will set the other fellows guessing.

TRADE MARK

Pay Roll

is the biggest item of expense in almost every business. In no business is your pay roll so small in proportion to your income as in provided you start with the right machine. A cheap machine may not only spoil your patronage by the blurry, halting, unsteady pictures it projects, but will eat up your profits on repairs. The Edison Kinetoscope is a motion picture machine that in itself is a beforehand guarantee of steady, clear pictures—the real base on which your prospects of profit depends. It is a machine that is inexpensive to operate and maintain and requires few repairs.

Get into the motion picture game and get your share of the profits—but start right—with the Edison Kinetoscope.

BUILT FOR SERVICE

The keynote of mechanical construction nowadays is the capacity for service. The buyer of any piece of mechanism demands service. Whether it is a saw-mill, a harvester, an automobile or a watch, the intelligent purchaser buys for service. It must do what it is intended to do; it must do it well; it must do it without break-downs; and it must do it for a long time.

Power's Cameragraph No. 6 is the only American moving picture machine which has been truly "built for service".

In design, materials and workmanship it is adapted to yield the service that satisfies.

Our booklet "The Proof of the Pudding" tells in the words of exhibitors in every state in the Union the kind of service it gives;

Our guarantee of one year against wear and breakage insures long service; and

Our sales of fifteen hundred "Number Sixes" since New Year's show how extensively it is going into service.

No matter what price you pay, "Power's No. 6" is the best value you can get. Send for catalog and proposition G.

BACK TO NATURE

is a lesson in success—showing that the obtaining of it in the prosperous city is actually much more difficult than "back on the farm." Of course, the accepted idea is that the tattered country boy comes to the city and makes a fortune; but fortunes of this making are really the exceptions and the country boy who succeeds is usually the country boy who leaves the overcrowded city alone and "works" his farm into a paying proposition. In the present picture, this realization comes to one who was NO boy—indeed, a broken-down "city failure" of middle years. But even at his age he changed a city knock-down to a "back-to-nature" triumph, and resurrected a drooping wife and family along with himself.

The Little Winged God at His Best.

CUPID THE CONQUEROR

is one of the neatest phantasy pictures we ever put forth on a market that fancies phantasies when they're well done. Phantasies in films are rare because they are really difficult to produce, calling for stage and photographic tricks that are not always sure of success. So the straight drama or comedy is much preferred by the picture maker. Here, however, we give you a film that YOU prefer—an unusual story, with unusual effects, unusually presented, and really worth unusual effort to book.

"The Ranch Girl"

This story is built around the rescue of a Cowboy by his pony. The action allotted the pony in this picture is educational in that it shows the intelligence and the affection of the average Western horse. The film is a feature in every respect, but the scenes in which the four-footed actor appears are extraordinary to a degree.

A request for this feature entered now at your exchange will be conducive of an early booking.

MR. PECK GOES CALLING

It is Mrs. Peck's birthday and Peck has bought her a ring, she having quite forgotten the date. They make a neighborly call and poor Peck is placed in a very embarrassing position. He falls to sleep and is later taken for a burglar. He escapes, but leaves his coat behind, which is found later by Mrs. Peck. It takes a deal of explanation, backed up by the present of the diamond ring to convince her that he was a victim of circumstances.

THE BEAUTIFUL VOICE

An eccentric Frenchman passing along the avenue. hears the sound of a beautiful voice and forthwith falls in love with the unseen singer, assuming that she must be as charming as her voice. He bestows upon her several presents before he has the courage to introduce himself. When he does present himseif, he finds the beautiful voice pouring from the horn of a phonograph and the recipient of his offerings an antiquated piece of effusive femininity.

OUT FROM THE SHADOW

The Result of Giving Way to Excessive Grief

Since the death of their only child Mrs. Vane gives herself up to morbid grief, to the neglect of her husband, herself and household duties. She sits continually weeping over the child's little garments, and despite her husband's efforts to cheer her, she persists in indulging in this moroseness. Her husband, therefore, is forced to seek more agreeable companionship outside his own home, and in time the wife appreciates his indifference. She complains to her mother, who tells her she alone is to blame, and if she doesn't change she will lose his love altogether. The wife realizes the strength of this advice, and determines to win her husband back. However, the awakening has come too late, for her husband has formed an attachment for a vivacious young widow. More subtle plans must be formed, and she succeeds in fascinating him at a dance they both attend, by arousing his jealousy.

Released Saturday, August 5 Length About 1,000 feet

AN INDIAN'S APPRECIATION

This handsome Western has to do with two cowboys, a girl and a crippled Indian. One of the cowboys is kind to the Indian and the Indian is able to give warning when he learns of a plot to carry off the girl. Full of vim, virile strength, action and love interest. Don't miss it.

Released Monday, August 7 Length About 1,000 feet

HER TWO SONS

A story of a brother's devotion. He shields his blind mother from knowledge of her other son's evil habits. Strong love interest; for one brother steals the other's sweetheart. A photo-play that skilfully acts on the human emotions. One that they'll talk about.

Facts and Comments

SELF-SUFFICENCY is as a rule the doom of honest effort and the next to the last station on the road to total failure. It is a most insidious disease, for it gives no pain to the patient, but only afflicts those who are near him or who, if he is a film maker, have to look at his productions. The moment a film maker begins to resent criticism or thinks himself above it, he begins to deteriorate. There is in the world of moral economics absolutely no place for self-sufficiency and self-conceit; they exist merely as symptoms of a fatal disease which must end in disaster. Nothing is easier for self-sufficiency than to take and abide by a very optimistic judgment of itself. Self-sufficiency then falls into a rut, which leads downward. There results a series of tiresome pictures, all based on about four or five types, and the exhibitor begins to suffer, because the public fiercely and quickly resents a policy of self-sufficiency on the part of film makers and stage directors.

There are some film manufacturers who obtrude this self-sufficiency, this arrogance and vaunted consciousness of superiority to a degree which at times provokes nausea. Let them not lay the flattering unction to their souls that they are so well entrenched as to be able to assume an attitude of defiance. No man nor set of men were ever indispensable in this world, and no amount of extraneous power and influence will make the mediocre picture "go" with the public, which is the ultimate arbiter in all things. The mediocre only live while the truly meritorious are not competing. If one maker persists in blinding himself with the belief in his own perfection and infallibility, another maker will come along, keenly self-critical, ambitious, eager for improvement, and the latter will replace the former.

We are moved to make these sundry and various remarks by the frightful sameness of scenery and of topic and of plot and of acting and of everything else, which become prominent, painfully prominent, in certain makes of film. A hundred cold baths of criticism seem to have no effect. Especially in the matter of plots a serious word is in order to certain makers of film. The utter disregard of previous filming of the same subject is also an utter disregard of the rights of the exhibitor and of the equities of the public. To mention but one type of overworked plots—the memory of moral nerve or whatever it is, lost through fast living or accident and then slowly but surely regained in the course of the last 500 feet of the film. Let us have no more of that sort of thing until the robins nest again.

A PICTURE which grossly offends the religious belief of any considerable portion of the public should never be allowed to pass the Board of Censors. It is not necessary to mention the particular picture which we have in mind—it is a principle which is involved, not any certain picture. An enlightened and liberal-minded body of censors have every right to regard themselves as competent judges of what is shocking to the religious sensibilities of the American public. The idea that the film maker should have the privilege of putting out such offensive pictures because he hurts nobody but himself is narrow and illogical. A bad picture hurts the whole industry. The frame politic of this country was reared on principles of religious toleration, and a film which will wound the religious feelings of any American sect should as a matter of course, be banished from the moving picture theatre by a representative American board of censors.

THE moving picture and the moving picture theatre are so modern and recent that in most states in this Union there is no reference to it on the statute books. The next few years will see voluminous legislation for the moving picture and its theatres. To influence this legislation should be one of the most important duties of the organized exhibitors. When the tender-hearted senators at Washington want to revise the wool schedule they invite all persons interested to be heard. This is as it should be under a representative system of government. The exhibitors, however, have never been invited to be heard nor have they even been heard uninvited in matters vitally concerning their bread and butter. The moving picture still is the lawful prey of the legislative "striker" or the hungry politician. This situation will undoubtedly come before the convention in Cleveland and should be carefully dealt with. If necessary let the exhibitors make a stir in politics, concentrate their efforts in a given campaign either on the election of an avowed champion of the picture or on the defeat of one of its known enemies. A decisive victory will make them respected as a power in politics ever after.

CONVERSATION with exhibitors has convinced us that they would appreciate a more chaste style of advertising on the part of some of the film makers. Chaste and plain are interchangeable for the purposes of this paragraph. The exhibitors are without exception over twenty-one years old and may be presumed to be endowed with average intelligence and some experience with hard facts in this universe of hard knocks. A moderate statement and an avoidance of superlatives will generally carry more conviction than the cheap rhetoric of the press agent; all of which is submitted for the general benefit of everybody.

A STRONG argument for the introduction of motion pictures in the public schools is advanced by Mrs. Perry Starkweather, of the Woman's Department of the State Labor Bureau of Minnesota. From investigations made in Duluth, Minneapolis and St. Paul it has been found that school children spend $80,000 yearly in admissions to picture shows. It is proposed by the Woman's Department that much of this money may be diverted by installing pictures in the schools and, by permitting the parents to attend the exhibitions, create social centers in the schools. It is proposed that the school authorities shall set aside a certain sum for this purpose.

Students of the educational picture are fast arriving at the conclusion that it has a definite place in the public school. The Moving Picture World has, time and again, pointed out the suitableness of certain pictures relating to history and geography for school purposes. The number is rapidly increasing. Of the so-called scenic and travel pictures there is a wide range of subjects, and several American makers are producing pictures illustrative of interesting incidents of American history. It would seem to be a great economic waste should these subjects serve no greater purpose than the cheapest slap-stick comedy. Boards of Education should arrange to make them available for purposes of instruction. Possibly the plan suggested by Mrs. Starkweather will solve the problem, or lead to a proper solution.

THE first national convention of moving picture exhibitors at Cleveland, on August 1, will have fixed another important landmark in the history of the picture industry in this country; and it should result in lasting and increasing good for the industry generally. Much cannot be expected, however, from this first meeting, except that a start will be made and the ground broken for a richer harvest next year. Nothing but good can result from the bringing together of representative exhibitors from all parts of the country. The exchange of experiences will be valuable. The comparison of conditions in various sections will be instructive. The attitude of governing bodies towards the picture can be ascertained and remedies suggested. The grievances of exhibitors can be considered temperately and justly.

No stronger proof is needed of the great growth and importance of moving picture entertainment than the fact that 1,000 intelligent business men will gather from every section to discuss the exhibition end of the picture industry. The need for organization, local and national, has been felt by exhibitors in the past. Where attempts were made to organize, individual selfishness and jealousies prevented unity. Now views have broadened and the exhibition business has reached a higher plane. City and state associations of exhibitors have been formed and successfully maintained, and now it is wisely sought to form a national organization. With a right purpose, sound policy and well-balanced officers, the national organization can exert a great and beneficent influence over the future of the moving picture. At the very outset it would be wise to be introspective and discover the weak points in the exhibiting end and the means of strengthening them. It would be well to consider admission prices, which in most cities are away below what picture entertainment merits.

THE police authorities have laid down certain rules for the display of film posters in the city of Detroit. The matter is treated fully in the news columns of THE MOVING PICTRE WORLD, and is well worth the attention of every exhibitor. Too many of the film posters now in use look like mortal sins and abominations unto good taste. To attract the common herd resort is had to a realism of the dime museum and anatomical cabinet variety, and such posters are not only offensive to the police but disgusting to all clean-minded persons. It is short-sighted policy to attract the noisy and callous youth and repel the decent and orderly element. Lithographic and "home-made" posters of the blood and thunder sort are running riot in some sections of this city, and are positive eye sores. They are seen by thousands of people every day, and the harm they do to the moving picture art at large is incalculable. The front of some moving picture houses in this city needs censoring much more than the films do.

IT is reported that Mr. Nat C. Goodwin, an American actor of undoubted genius and originality, still in the prime of his power, is about to enter the ranks of the film makers and directors and actors of the silent stage. The great talents of this gifted actor make him particularly promising in the field of refined comedy, as those who have seen him take the part of Bottom in "The Midsummernight's Dream" will readily believe. The conviction that the moving picture will work out a wonderful destiny in the amusements of future generations is growing among all the stage folk, and they are all preparing to join. In connection with the news of the Milano production, Dante's "Inferno," being placed on one of the big circuits, the news of Goodwin "going in" for moving pictures presages a strong movement toward the photoplay, and there is plenty of room for the best.

The Exhibitor's Opportunity

Last week, in commenting upon the approaching convention of exhibitors at Cleveland, we concluded with the remark: "The time has come when the voice of the exhibitor must be heard and heeded in the councils of the industry." If the convention is to be composed of agitators, more harm than good will ensue. If it is attended by men who are serious in their attempt to better their own condition and advance the standard and remove obstacles to progress, we say to every exhibitor, go by all means if you can and take part in the discussions. This is the reply we made to one exhibitor who writes a lengthy letter citing certain grievances against the exchanges and manufacturers, ending with the question, "Do you think it would do me any good to attend the Cleveland convention?"

Our correspondent runs a small show in one of the suburbs of a large city. He says, in part:

"I started in with the Independent service as there was a theater in town showing the Licensed Service films. After a few weeks during which I received some very good reels, the service began to get so poor that the patronage dropped off and I could not get any satisfaction by complaining or offering to pay for the privilege of selecting a program. So I tried the General Film Company and did get a good program from them to start with. But now what a service! It is ruining my business. The other day I was to receive "Il Trovatore" and announced it widely. When the reel came it was in such bad condition that it broke several times and my operator would not take chances on running it through the machine a second time. Consequently my advertising was wasted and my patrons disappointed. I had heard complaints against the service, but had not the least idea that it was so rotten and so autocratic. Only yesterday they had the nerve to keep me standing in the ante room without a single chair or bench, from 2 to 4.25 p. m., for my reels. I was not the only one. Many other exhibitors and operators were there and each one kicking. What is the use to kick? When one exhibitor complained that he had been waiting for two hours for a reel and had missed his train, the booking clerk told him to 'mind his own business, that he could not dictate and that if he dared to talk back he would be thrown out of the place.' There seemed to be no order or system, yet even the employees of the place acted as if they were autocrats."

There is more in the same strain, and if this exhibitor attends the convention and states his case, and it is corroborated by others, surely some steps can be taken to correct what is an outrage and which will in time drive all self-respecting men out of the exhibiting field. This is the exhibitors' paper and it was in their interest that we first advocated the establishing of local associations to protect themselves against burdensome city or state restrictions, also a National organization to cement and strengthen the locals. It is before this National meeting that such questions as the quality and kind of service should be discussed.

Knowing that many of the General Film Company offices are giving service that is highly satisfactory to the exhibitor, we referred the above complaint to the main office. Before making any comment, the manager read an equally strong letter from a committee of exhibitors in the same section complaining bitterly against demands that the reels be returned after the show the same night or before a certain hour the following morning. He said: "We are trying to please the exhibitor to the best of our ability, but if the reels are not returned in time they cannot pass through the inspection department, neither can one exhibitor get his reels early if the man who had them the previous day brings them in late." So the one complaint answers the other, and the only solution that would answer the wishes of both complainants is that the exchanges purchase double the number of copies and work them on half time, which, of course, they could not do at the present rental prices.

When an exhibitor takes the trouble to write to his trade paper setting forth his grievances with the service he is getting, it is but reasonable to suppose that before doing so he has tried to bring the exchange to his way of thinking. Some of the complaints we have published, others we have referred to the proper persons for investigation. When these complaints are discussed with the exchanges, the invariable reply is that the "exhibitors are born kickers and do not know what they want." Such a reply is not only unjust, but it is absurd. We have had complaints from exhibitors that they cannot get what they are willing to pay for and which is available in the market. With many of them it is not a question of price. Is it any wonder then that the down-trodden worm shows a disposition to turn, and that at the Exhibitors' Convention at Cleveland they will discuss ways and means to protect their investments.

At the present time the policy of the competing groups of manufacturers is the killing competition of quality. The exhibitor, the wise exhibitor, does not desire some 36 licensed and 48 independent releases per week, many of which they are ashamed to show on the screen. They would be better satisfied with half that number, provided they were good productions, pictures that they could show several times, pictures that would satisfy their patrons and call for repeats. With few exceptions the manufacturer who has doubled or trebled his output has done so at the expense of quality. It has been argued that the increased program prevents duplication in congested centers, but what is to prevent the greedy exhibitor who started the daily change from changing his pictures twice a day just to outdo his neighbor? If he is willing to pay for it there are no doubt exchanges who will be foolish enough to supply him.

The popularity of a number of past productions, some of them two and three reels, has proved to the discriminating exhibitor that the success of his business depends upon quality and not on quantity. The present system of working is a serious handicap to quality. We know of one manufacturer whose average sale per release is less than one-third of what it was when he was turning out half the number of weekly releases. Is it to be expected that this manufacturer can put into his work the same amount of money and brains that he could with the larger sales? The exhibitors very justly complain at the drop in quality and bewail the plethora of pointless comedy, weary drama and overdone and underdone Indian and cowboy ad nauseum; but they are themselves largely to blame for the condition. We doubt if there is any manufacturer to-day who would not prefer to be turning out one good reel per week of which he could sell from 150 to 200 copies, than three and four reels of stuff which can only command a sale of from 40 to 50 copies. Aside from the larger profit as an inducement, we believe there is not a manufacturer in the field who does not have the ambition to proceed along the lines of quality instead of quantity. That is evident from their repeated attempts to produce from the classics and the popular authors such as Dickens and Hugo, but the single release 1,000-foot reel and daily release system renders it impossible to do justice to subjects that would raise the motion picture above its present level.

If the number of present available releases is to be kept up or increased, as the indications are, an open market is the only hope. It would at least place a premium on quality and it would benefit the progressive manufacturer. Whether or no the manufacturers as a whole desire an open market, we know of several who would welcome it. Unless we are very much mistaken all the manufacturers will have to accept the issue at no very distant date, for their commercial organizations have failed to turn the restricted market to any better use than fostering incompetency and discouraging the progress of the art.

The Film Maker's Responsibilities.

"How shall we plan, that all be fresh and new?
"Important matter, yet attractive, too;
"For 'tis my pleasure to behold them surging,
"When to our booth the current sets apace,
"And with the tremendous oft-repeated urging,
"Onward they squeeze through the gates of grace."

The first and foremost responsibility of the film maker consists in taking a just view of his public. He is in far more danger of underestimating, than overestimating the intelligence, education and taste of his audience. Let him remember that, the whole show business has, within the last few decades, undergone changes for the better. Fly-by-night enterprises, vagrant and irresponsible circuses, disreputable dime museums, chambers of horrors, etc., common enough within the memory of most of us, have largely become things of the past. The film maker is right in thinking well of himself, but he must likewise think well of the men, women and children, whom he is privileged to amuse, entertain and instruct.

The second great responsibility, therefore, should consist in eliminating everything that could by any possibility offend. Every human being has a spiritual nature, which finds expression in the varying religions of the day. Above all things this feeling should be scrupulously respected. It is not a sectarian feeling, but the universal religion of humanity. This is no idle warning, for we have but very recently seen both Independent and Licensed films, more or less grossly violating the religious sensibilities of different Christian churches. We do not for an instant assume that such offences are committed willfully, but heedlessness in such matters is in its effects at least fully as reprehensible as malice aforethought.

American womanhood represents a fine type and is entitled to great respect at the hands of the film maker. American chivalry is not a surface sentiment, but is deeply rooted in the national character. If in the film story "lovely woman stoops to folly," let it, as a rule, be a very human and natural folly, one, which is allied to virtue and goodness, rather than to vice or viciousness. Everything, at which the better nature of man revolts, should be avoided. The antics of insane people, the physical or moral deformities of men or women are not laughable, but intensely sad and distressing to every normal mind. The oddities of certain nations are a legitimate subject for film comedy, but there are limits, beyond which it is not safe to venture. Humor here degenerates too easily into ridicule and ridicule is both cruel and offensive.

The selection of subjects or rather of types of subjects, is another very great responsibility. Tragedy, pure and simple, except where it is derived from classic sources, to wit, Shakespeare and the Greeks, should be used very sparingly indeed. In the whole history of the world there have been but four men possessing the art and genius of playing with wholesome effect upon the deepest human emotions. Nothing, however, seems to attract the amateur playwright more quickly than the tragic drama, and nothing is more utterly beyond his power. The exhibition of human misery without an explicit or implied moral, is no part of the mission of the photoplay. The anatomy of melancholy has no place on the moving picture screen. The whole school of morbid and sensational pessimists, of which Zola, Ibsen, Sudermann, Shaw and Nietzsche have been, or still are, the chief exponents, should be forever banished from the studio of the film maker. These men have delighted in advertising corruption. They have, with infernal skill, torn the veil from the hideous things in life, "the noisome, creeping things, waiting on decay." Nature and the instinctive common decency of mankind have always left, and always will leave, these things to work out their own destruction in silence and darkness. We want no delineation of moral leprosy in the photoplay. It is well to pause here just a moment and to remind ourselves, that we owe the evils of the pessimistic problem play, with its open sewers, largely to a public reaction and protest against the melodrama. Public intelligence and education, more widely diffused than ever before, have laughed and scorned the melodrama to death and it can scarcely be revived via the moving picture route. It is altogether too unreal to please this wise and inquisitive generation. Man is so constituted that he yearns for the truth and when it comes to a choice between vapid and mawkish sentimentality and repugnant, abhorrent, but real and actual features of life, he will prefer to look at the latter.

The modern audience everywhere, but nowhere more so than in this country, loves the story, that pours a drop of balm into the heart, it likes to see the brighter side of life, it welcomes a portrayal of the latent possibilities of good in man or woman, it delights in pictures of the silent and hidden, but very real heroism of the every day life right around us.

". . . Let us then such a drama give,
"Grasp the exhaustless life, that all men live.
"Each shares therein, though few may comprehend
"Where'er you touch it, there's interest without end."

A little more than a year ago a certain film maker closely adhered to just about such a program, making the photoplay a vehicle for a sound and humorous optimism. The popular response was instantaneous and the demand for that kind of a film became universal. The mine, from which re drew is still at the disposal of every film maker with the right machinery in the gray matter. So arrange your story's action, so choose and draw your characters, that the last vibration of the audience's heart-strings answer the touch of Hope and Humor, of Pity or Admiration, of Love or Joy.

"Then pluck up heart and give us sterling coin.
"Let Fancy be with her attendants fitted,
"Sense, Reason, Sentiment and Passion join,
"But have a care lest Folly be omitted."

There is a law in the final order of things, that he who will not accept his responsibility, is sure to lose his power.

NOTE—The quotations are from the prelude to "Faust."

The Vogue of Western and Military Drama

The vogue of Western and military dramas, which bids fair to continue for some time to come, is by no means to be deplored. Man is never more interesting than when far away from the conventions of an over-civilized society. We love to see the rude frontiersman, who faces dangers day after day. We want to know how he looks and acts on his native heath. We like his free and breezy manner and our interest is continuous, because we can never exactly know what he is going to do next. We do not feel any such interest in the hackneyed types of the big towns and when we see the dude coming out of the night restaurant, we do not care what he is going to do or where he is going to go. He, and other figures all too common in metropolitan life, are too familiar and you know how easily familiarity with the real article in real life begets contempt.

Instinctively we are attracted by a struggle of any kind whether it is the struggle of the pioneer with Nature and the red man or the fight of soldier with soldier. On the plains of the West or in the tented field the hearts of men are weighed and tested and it makes no difference whether their suspenders are crumpled or their neckties sit badly if they are sound at the core. We are almost tempted to envy the Indian for his lack of civilization. We feel that he is so much closer to nature and a suspicion steals over us that after all he is happier than we are. Less than a century ago this would have been impossible for Indians were then a constant source of real and horrible danger. Then we hated the red man and did him very scant justice.

Our feelings toward the red man have undergone much the same change that came over the English in their relations to the Scotch highland clans. Up to the time of William of Orange, the English, suffering very real hardships from the border depredations of the highland clans, regarded them as little better than highway robbers. A war of extermination was begun against them. Then when all danger from them had passed and when, long afterward, there came a formal union, the English went to the other extreme and could not seemingly go far enough in their admiration and fondness for highland history, highland customs and institutions, until the once despised attire of the Hihlander was affected by the nobility, and even the royal family of England.

Our Indians are no longer dangerous. We understand to-day better than ever that we have wronged them much and often, that we have misjudged and slandered them in the past. Now and for some years past, the reaction has set in and it is surely a curious phase of the white man's civilization, that his latest invention is helping to set the red man right in history and in his position before the American people. All of the more artistic Indian films exalt the Indian, depict the noble traits in his character and challenge for him and his views and manner of life the belated admiration of his white brother. In fact this tendency to do the Indian justice runs through all the pictures. In this way, if you will think it over, you may account for the continued popularity of Indian films.

The military drama, so-called, supplies the most picturesque kind of action. Note the coinage of that word "picturesque." The battle of life is, to be sure, carried on everywhere, in the tenement as in the palace, among the young as well as among the old, but it is less "picturesque," less obvious than the battle of professional fighting men.

We believe that both the Western and military features will continue their popularity, but cannot help expressing a wish that some of our film makers, "who go in for this sort of thing," would realize, that here, too, quality alone can win in the end. A crowd of painted Indians, recruited from the Bowery, and tougher than any Indian ever dared to be, a few U. S. soldiers, wearing all sorts of fatigue uniforms, a "Mexican Pete," who has apparently abstracted all the hardware of a 5 and 10 cents store, rough riders and cowboys, who could not locate the West on a school map, do not constitute either a Western or a military drama, no matter how often "Gila Jake" saves "Juanita" from the horrible half-bred, and no matter how often the cowboys ride over the alkali deserts in pursuit of the indefatigable horse thief.

Signs of a Harvest

By W. Stephen Bush.

Unwaveringly the MOVING PICTURE WORLD ever since its first issue went into the mails has stood for the higher ideals. In season and out of season it has proclaimed the great future destiny of the motion picture. There was much ignorance and indifference to be encountered in the campaign for progress and uplift, and once in a while there were indignant and passionate, if rambling and illogical, pleas for the enthronement of the "Low-Brows."

Time and again this paper has pointed out that the hope of the moving picture lay away from cheap comedy and cheap melodrama; that to put it on broad and lasting foundations it must seek to gain the sympathy and recognition of the best and highest elements in our civilization.

Especially have we emphasized the necessity of winning public opinion to our side. Often we had occasion to censure and deplore the flippant vulgarity of the daily press, which with far more complacency than wit chose to make the photoplay and the great art from which it takes its origin the target of silly jests and so-called paragraphic humor.

It is therefore with unfeigned pleasure that we observe of late a great reaction; that the indications seem to point to a recognition of the moving picture by the serious and intelligent press of the country. An instance to the point is an article in "The Bookman," by Clayton Hamilton. The article is exceedingly well written, but there is little in it which THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD has not at some time or other spread in its columns. Much that in these pages would look trite, because repeated so often, no doubt has all the gloss of newness to the readers of "The Bookman." The effort to give the photoplay sensible criticism in a magazine of standing must be a matter of congratulation among the friends of the art.

The plea, made by the writer for intelligent criticism of the motion picture, is cleverly put and worth quoting in full. It says:

> The domain of criticism is co-extensive with the domain of art, and should naturally be broadened to include those new provinces which the inventions of science and the consequent inventions of art have recently discovered and annexed. It will not do for the critic to ignore a new art because it is new or because its basis is mechanical. All art arises from the application of a mechanism; and the hoariest of the traditional arts was new at some time in the history of mankind. The critic of architecture must accept the skyscraper; the critic of painting must consider the new art of photography; and it is surely not logical that the moving picture play should be ignored by our critics of the novel and the drama. A new type of narrative that has achieved such immediate and such wide-spread popularity as the moving picture play must certainly be worthy of serious criticism. If we should learn nothing else from a study of its materials and methods, we should at least succeed in clarifying our ideas concerning those pre-existent types of narrative from which it has derived its processes.

Equally interesting and pertinent are the writer's observations relative to the basic structure of the photoplay:

> THE FILMS AND SOME CLASSICS.
> Even a casual study of the moving picture play will convince us of the soundness of that principle of contemporary criticism that nearly every good play has for its basis a good pantomime, and that dialogue—the purely literary element—while not the least important, is at any rate the least indispensable, of the many elements which are compounded in that complex work of art, the acted drama. The kinematograph bereaves the drama of the spoken word; and it must be surprising to the literary theorists to learn how much is left—how vividly the essential elements of action, character, and setting may convey themselves by visual means alone. Pantomime has been recognized for many centuries as a legitimate type of drama; but it is safe to say that the variety and the extent of its adaptability as a means of story telling were never fully understood until the invention of the kinematograph demanded of it an unprecedented exercise.

The author is fully alive to the advantages of the silent drama in the matter of settings over the conventional restrictions that must always hamper the stage of the spoken drama. On this subject he aptly remarks:

> Obviously, the most desirable narrative material for a moving picture play is material in which the elements of action and setting are paramount and the element of character subsidiary—in other words, a story in which incident treads upon the heels of incident and the action rushes headlong through a hurried succession of objective events, set preferably out of doors. It will be noticed at once that, whereas this definition utterly fails to fit the modern regular drama, it almost exactly fits the traditional romantic novel of adventure. If we revert to an illustration that has already been adduced, we shall observe that this definition of what is necessary in a moving picture play points directly to that traditional type of narrative that Stevenson revivified in "Treasure Island."
> In fact, a re-reading of Stevenson's "Gossip on Romance" will give us a very vivid sense of the sources of the interest and charm of which the moving picture play is particularly capable. What Stevenson says in praise of the romantic novel of adventure may be applied with equal justice to that new art which did not spring into existence till after he was dead. "The story," he says, "should repeat itself in a thousand colored pictures to the eye. It was for this last pleasure that we read so closely, and loved our books so dearly, in the bright, troubled period of boyhood. Eloquence and thought, character and conversation, were but obstacles to brush aside as we dug blithely after a certain sort of incident, like a pig for truffles. For my part, I liked a story to begin with an old wayside inn, where 'toward the close of the year 17—,' several gentlemen in three-cocked hats were playing bowls. A friend of mine preferred the Malabar coast in a storm, with a ship beating to windward, and a scowling fellow of Herculean proportions striding along the beach; he, to be sure, was a pirate. . . . One and all, at least, and each with his particular fancy, we read our storybooks in childhood, not for eloquence or character or thought, but for some quality of the brute incident. . . . Conduct is three parts of life, they say; but I think they put it high. There is a vast deal in life . . . where the interest turns . . . not on the passionate slips and hesitations of the conscience, but on the problems of the body and of the practical intelligence, in clean open-air adventure, the shock of arms or the diplomacy of life. With such material as this it is impossible to build a play, for the serious theater exists solely on moral grounds, and is a standing proof of the dissemination of human conscience. But it is possible to build upon this ground, . . . the most lively, beautiful and buoyant tales."
> Here, in the words of a great artist in narrative, we have a clear and comprehensive statement of the possibilities that lie open to the maker of the moving picture play. He cannot contend with the dramatist in working out those problems of conscience which confront the will; he cannot compete with the novelist in analyzing characters; but he may tell, with a vividness beyond the reach of their less visual expedients of appeal, "the most lively, beautiful and buoyant tales," in which the interest is centered not in "eloquence or character or thought" but in "some quality of the brute incident."
> It is evident, therefore, that the art of the moving picture play is not an art to be despised or ignored by serious criticism. It represents, in fact—to look upon it from the historical point of view—a reversion to an earlier and more perrenially refreshing mood of narrative than that which latterly has assumed dominion over the novel and the drama. The moving picture play carries us back to the boyish age of the great art of telling tales, when stories were narrated nakedly as stories, instead of being "sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought." One can hardly imagine Mr. Henry James devising a successful scenario for the kinematograph, but the Shakespeare, who wrote "Richard III," and the Homer, who wrote the Odyssey, would experience no difficulty in fulfilling the requirements. It is only very recently that the masters of the art of fiction have made war upon the optic nerve and exalted the subjective over the objective. Our modern interest in those intimate phases of character, which refuse to reveal themselves in action, is certainly sophisticated and excessive. It is therfore with a feeling somewhat of relief that we notice that the newest of all the arts of narrative—the moving picture play—disembarrases its stories of psychologizing and tells them in the free and boyish spirit that vivified the epic, the drama and the novel throughout the centuries before the world grew old."

From this, however, it is not to be inferred that the author underestimates the power of the silent stage in the delineation of character, for he says in another place:

Such a farce, for example, as "Le Médecin Malgré Lui" of Molière could easily tell itself through the medium of the moving picture and would still awaken laughter. Molière's humor always expresses itself through the situation or the character and never through the mere language of the dialogue; in all his plays there is not a single witty line; and humor which is thus visual, instead of auditory, in its appeal may be conveyed in pantomime. The screen scene of "The School for Scandal"—to choose an instance from high comery—would remain clearly intelligible in all its necessary implications if it were acted without words.

The following surely sounds like one of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD'S own observations on one of the most gratifying developments and accomplishments of the motion picture. We quote:

It is not at all surprising that the moving picture play has driven out of existence the cheap type of popular melodrama. The reason is not merely that the moving picture show could undersell the regular theater and offer a performance for five cents instead of for ten, twenty and thirty. In the whole history of the world, no art, however cheap, has ever annihilated a more expensive art, which was basically better than itself. The real reason for the triumph of the moving picture play is the purely critical reason that it offered a more artistic type of narrative than the old popular melodrama. In cheap melodrama, all that was worth while was the vividness and the variety of incidents; the characters did not count except as puppets in the plot, and the dialogue, crude and frequently absurd, was more a bother than a help. In abolishing dialogue the moving picture show relieved the cheap drama of its weakest element; it could suggest character with less obvious falsification than the actual popular drama and it could easily excel it in the projection of incidents, both on the score of variety and the score of vividness.

The writer concludes his article as follows:

The thing that is surprising is that, except in France, the moving picture play has not more fully availed itself of those artistic opportunities which are open to it and thereby raised itself to a competition with more refined and more expensive types of drama than were set forth in the old ten, twenty and thirty cent theaters. * * * The new art must bestir itself to fulfill more completely than heretofore the high artistic aims, of which it is indubitably capable. It is too good an art for the public to lose and it can retain its popularity if it labors to deserve it.

We think that the concluding remarks of the writer are a trifle too severe and scarcely borne out by the facts. On the whole, the art both here and abroad has "labored to deserve popularity" of the best kind, and with the reproduction of Dante in motion pictures it has reached a height with which it may for the present be well pleased and rest a moment on its laurels.

Dr. R. E. Distin Maddick, well known in English moving picture circles as the proprieor of the Scala Theater, of London, commenting upon the historic importance of the Coronation, proposes the establishment of a National Film Museum in which the films recording great events should be deposited and used for the instruction of future generations.

"The Day of the Dump"

By Homer W. Sibley.

"The moving picture business is dead." How often this remark is made by men who ought to know better, and how strange it is that any person in the moving picture business should make a remark of that kind.

The moving picture business of today is not the moving picture business of yesterday; it is a modern business and has taken its place among the substantial institutions of the world.

True, the "dump" is doomed, and the sooner the cheap, ill-smelling, poorly ventilated, badly managed rendezvous for the masher and tough makes way for the better class of popular family theater the better it will be for the business and all concerned.

A few years ago, anyone with a few hundred dollars could open up a moving picture show in a store-room, and make money; so many of these places opened up and made money for their owners that they began popping up like mushrooms all over the country, and especially in the larger cities, until one could hardly walk a block in any direction without finding a moving picture show, usually with sawdust on the floor, and under the management of a man totally ignorant of the business, and without any ability as a manager.

This condition exists in very few places now, as the larger theatrical interests, realizing the future of motion pictures readily put money into the enterprise, and forced the "dump" manager to improve his place, or give way to a more sanitary and better conducted place.

One may liken the moving picture business to any other business, and find that history repeats itself. For instance, a few years ago the neighborhood store in the country village prospered, simply because there was no opposition, and the proprietor of that store smiled when the large department store was built on the corner, and usually predicted that the big fellow would close up in a few months; but the result was always the same—the big fellow prospered and made the old-time merchant improve his stock and brighten up his store, or else put him out of business entirely. True, in some instances, the old fellow plodded along in the old rut, with enough business from his old personal friends to keep his head above water, but his business was gone.

And so it is with the moving picture business today. The cheap fellow with the bad service, and a lot of rainy films, poor talent in his place, and an absolute disregard for the comfort of his patrons, stands out in front of his "dump" laughing at the neat little theater that is getting ready to open on the next corner, telling his friend, the barber or confectioner from next door, that the new fellow is a fool to put his money in the moving picture business now; that it is a dead proposition, and he will give him just three months to close up and get out, usnally laughs the other way before the three months are over.

The new place has attracted the people from the "dump" by its neat front, and once inside, the people have found comfortable seats and a well-ventilated place where their comfort has been as much of an object of attention as the excellence of the show.

When they have seen three or four reels of good film in good condition, projected with a good machine by a good operator; have heard a good singer accompanied by a good pianist who has played the pictures in a first-class manner, they make up their minds to come again.

So it is, when you hear that remark, "The moving picture business is dead," if you will investigate, you will find that the person who made it has suffered a loss of business through the opening of a more modern place, with a better show at the same price; and can see only his own loss—not the fact that the business is now on a more substantial basis than ever before, and modern methods must be employed to insure continued success.

MORE PATENT LITIGATION.

The Motion Picture Patents Company has begun suits on the Pross shutter and Latham loop patents, seeking to restrain unlicensed exhibitors from making, selling or using machines licensed and sold under these patents. This includes practically every make of projecting machine upon the American market. Notice of complaint has already been served upon two prominent New York City independent exhibitors and possibly in other parts of the country. Elsewhere in this paper will be found the announcement of the Motion Picture Distributing & Sales Company that it will undertake to defend any and all of these actions. Neither of the two patent claims have been sustained, although testimony in a suit on the Latham loop patent is now being taken.

Reviews of Notable Films

THE CONNECTING LINK (Eclair).

Exceedingly clever acting lifts this film somewhat above the dead level of the ordinary picture and entitles it to comment in this department. The story itself is not entirely new; it is, in fact, quite reminiscent of "La Dame aux Camilles," which the Pathe Company rendered into moving pictures with telling force more than a year ago. The scene of the present story is laid in much humbler surroundings than in Sardou's masterpiece, but gains rather than loses by that fact. The story of the infatuation is told forcefully and the incidents leading up to it are different, taking place in the open air and amid very pretty surroundings, all perfect in photography.

Scene from "The Connecting Link" (Eclair).

* * *

The actors and actresses in the play are without exception accomplished members of the great stock companies culled from different Parisian theaters of acknowledged standing. This fact stands out strikingly and pleasingly from the very beginning.

* * *

If any of the artists are aware that there is a camera in the immediate vicinity for the purpose of photographing all they do, the fact does not appear in their actions or manners. The story told in a few sentences deals with the infatuation of a middleaged man for a young woman. Of course, the middleaged man is married. There comes a crisis in the domestic life of the man, graphically and powerfully portrayed in the film. The wife is ill and the temptress is urgent. The man yields to temptation and deserts wife and child to live with the paramour. Both he and the latter are recalled to their duty and their better nature aroused in a fine climax, in which the child of the deserter makes a pathetic appeal first to the father and then to the woman. The success of the appeal is depicted with much dramatic finesse and will touch many an audience that might not have responded to the more subtle delineation of Sardou. The last scenes are especially fine—the wife happy over the flowers and still happier over the return of the repentant husband, who is quickly forgiven, and the sweet pleading and coaxing of the child evoke a sign of profound satisfaction.

We consider the actor's portrayal of the married man's folly in the light of a strong moral lesson, taken from the life around us. The existence and power of evil cannot be denied and where they are free, as they are in this film, from offensive forms, they surely are a legitimate subject for the playwright, the dictum of the "Charlotte Rousse and domestic ginger ale" moralist to the contrary notwithstanding.

THE JUDGE'S STORY (Thanhouser).

Whenever a film maker skillfully seizes and elaborates certain possibilities peculiar to the moving picture, as distinguished from the conventional stage, he is entitled to special credit. The story within a story is peculiarly within the province of the moving picture, and the makers of this film have shown themselves well capable of grasping and using this singular advantage. A negro, so the story runs, is unjustly accused of a capital crime and is put on trial. In the course of the proceedings, the old mother of the alleged culprit in the court-room recognizes the judge as a Confederate veteran, whose life was saved in years gone by through the courage of the accused. The judge, who had through the years vainly sought to discover and reward his benefactors, recognizes the Mammy and makes a remarkable plea to the jury for the acquittal of the accused. In the course of made of heroic stuff. He concludes his remarks with the his charge to the jurers he tells the story of his adventure in the war, which shows the negro and his mother to be words: "The evidence is wholly circumstantial; may God help you to find a verdict of not guilty."

It Is a Powerful Climax.

The charm of the story lies in the quick change from drama to dramatic narrative and the display of a fine ability to sustain the character of both equally well. After the Old Mammy has made her plea to the judge, we see the pictures showing the adventures of the latter when he was a young soldier fighting for the Stars and Bars. It is a most exciting narrative, well illustrating the aptitude of the moving picture for the telling in graphic and lively manner a story of pure adventure. The outdoor settings are particularly fine, and the acting of the young soldier much above the average. The scenes in the home of the soldier were affectingly natural and touching.

A warm word of commendation must be said for the jury. The director's work on this score can scarcely be praised too highly. It was a typical jury with just enough of a Southern touch in its make-up to give it the proper local color.

It is a pleasure in connection with this review to advert to the marked improvement in all the productions of this maker, who promises to give the industry many valuable contributions in the future.

THE CORONATION IN KINEMACOLOR.

During the week the Kinemacolor Company have received a most noteworthy set of pictures ever taken in the world's history of photography. These pictures were taken by royal command of King George the 5th and copies of them will be deposited in the sanctuary of the Tower of London going to make up a part of the historical archieves of the British Government for future historical ages.

Such a kaleidoscopic array of colors has probably never been witnessed in so short a space as was seen during the forty days of coronation festivities, commemorating the crowning of King George the 5th as ruler of the British Empire.

Among the pictures that may be mentioned are: "Trooping the Colors," "Empire Day," "Unveiling of Queen Victoria's Memorial," "The Embarkation of the Canadian Mounted Police," "The Disembarking at Liverpool," "The Camp at Hyde Park," "The East Indian Contingent in Camp at Hampton Court," "Natural London," "London Disguised," "The Naval Review at Spithead," "Peers and Peeresses Embarking on the Thames steamboat at Chelsea," "The Royal Procession," covering over six thousand feet of film, showing King George and Queen Mary at very close range, and the returning of the regalia worn at the coronation by the King to the Lord Mayor of London.

It may not be generally understood that the regalia and jewels worn by the King and Queen are of inestimable value. A number of the world's precious stone experts have tried to estimate the value of this regalia and have signally failed. The world's famous most precious stones are in this collection and their value is practically priceless.

THE NEW MANAGER.

A Dramatic Story of Business Life by Essanay.

The Essanay Company's dramatic subject, "The New Manager," released August 4th, is, in the opinion of that company's producers, one of the strongest and most appealing dramas by the Essanay Eastern Company that has been issued in some time. It tells a splendid story, the theme of which is uplifting in its defense of the old.

Old Samuel Gorman, according to the story, has been the manager of the firm of Carlton & Co. for more than thirty years and through his careful and conservative methods he has amassed a large fortune for his employer. However, upon the death of Carlton, head of the firm, young Phillip Carlton steps into his father's business with an earnest desire to make the name of Carlton & Co. world famous. His office staff is composed chiefly of old men with old ideas and when he lays plans before Gorman for a reconstruction of their methods generally, the old man shakes his head and says that only failure can be the result if they adopt the new ideas.

Young Carlton is displeased and resolves to sacrifice Gorman for a younger man, believing that what the business needs most is new brains and new blood, so he offers Gorman's position to an old college chum, and Gorman is told that his services are no longer required.

Two years pass by and Gorman, who received a $5,000 legacy from old man Carlton, has, by careful investments become a wealthy man, while young Carlton and the firm under the new manager have been steadily sinking until there is but a vestige of the great business left. To make matters worse Carleton meets Miss Gorman, who has just returned from Europe and, not knowing that she is the daughter of the man he threw out of his office, makes love to her and wins her consent to marry. At a reception one evening the match is unceremoniously broken off when the elder Gorman, coming on the scene, informs his daughter that her fiance is the man who threw him out of his position with Carleton & Co.

Scene from "The New Manager" (Essanay).

The next day the crash comes. Bankruptcy proceedings are inaugurated against the firm of Carlton & Co.

Gorman learns of the company's embarrassment and resolves to help the young man out. After some hesitation the offer is accepted. Carlton grasps Gorman's hand and murmurs his thanks, and his apologies for the caddish part he had played the few years before. That night at the Gorman home Carlton finds Nellie waiting for him and with a happy smile the old man turns his daughter over to the son of his former employer.

The new manager is exceptionally well cast with Francis Bushman as young Carlton, and Dorothy Phillips as Nellie Gorman. Bryant Washburn plays the "new manager," and Howard Messimer is excellent as Samuel Gorman. The acting in all parts is discriminatingly subdued, yet played with a quiet fervor and sincerity which is thoroughly convincing.

MIRROR SCREEN COMPANY INCREASES CAPITAL STOCK.

Papers were filed in Albany with the Secretary of State on July 26 by Thomas F. MacMahon, attorney for the Mirror and Transparent Screen Company of New York, which call for the increasing of the capital stock of that corporation from $5,000 to $50,000. The officers named are M. R. Sheedy, president; Frank Manning, vice-president, and Charles F. Pope, secretary and treasurer.

A representative of the Motion Picture World was informed by Charles F. Pope, general manager of the company, that it was because of the steadfast increase of business that the company was forced to recapitalize so as to be in accord with the constant widening of their field of operation. "There are more than three hundred mirror screens in actual operation at the present time," continued Mr. Pope. "We have been flooded with inquiries from all parts of the United States during the short time we have been advertising the mirror screen and we found it absolutely necessary to increase our capital so that we might increase our output. Under the old corporation it was only possible for us to put two screens per week on the market. Beginning with next month, however, we will be able to fill orders at the rate of one per day. The prime object of the company is to lease the mirror screen to the smaller picture houses at a nominal sum weekly. This will give the small operators the full benefit of 'Pictures in Daylight' protection in face of the laws that several of the State legislators have under advisement, and at a cost that will not be noticeable in the face of increasing business." The new company have opened offices at the Knickerbocker Theater Building in suites Nos. 203 and 204. Mr. Pope stated that within a week or ten days actual demonstration of the mirror and transparent screens would be given to those interested.

With the Western Producers

Los Angeles and Vicinity.

The work of enlarging the Selig local studio has started. The two-story building at the corner of C and Allesandro streets has been razed and ground has been broken for the new property room. When completed the studio will be one of the most elaborate and complete in the country and will rank far in the lead of the Coast studios. The south end of the concrete retaining wall will be extended until it will enclose a plot of land about 230 feet in length and 220 feet in width. The new wall will be built in the Santa Barbara Mission style. On the corner a concrete office structure will be erected and the present office rooms will be converted into dressing apartments. A 150-foot property room will be built in the back of the grounds. It will not be necessary to enlarge the glass-covered studio as it is now larger than is required.

The local company is at present working among the Santa Rosa Islands, off the coast of Santa Barbara, under the direction of Francis Boggs. About thirty members are in the company. Numerous boats have been chartered and some excellent marine pictures are expected. Mr. Boggs, who returned to Los Angeles for a few days in order to develop his negatives, told of a thrilling experience which he and seventeen other members of the company had while out cruising. The weather had been calm all day and the boat was well in toward shore, when, without any warning, they were caught in a storm. The boat dashed toward the rocky shore, the occupants expecting to be thrown out any moment. The anchor was thrown overboard in an endeavor to stop the ship, but the ocean bottom was too rocky and smooth for it to gain a hold. Just in time, the sails were hoisted and the ship was pulled out of danger. Mr. Boggs states that the company will probably return at the end of the week.

Fred Huntley, stage manager, was suddenly taken sick on the trip to Santa Barbara and was removed to a hospital. He is still under the care of a physician.

J. L. McGee, who has been sick for the past week, is rapidly recovering.

Miss Eugenie Bresserer, one of the company's stars, was recently thrown from her horse while returning home from work. She sustained lacerations about the body and the tendons of her right leg were torn. The horse became frightened, and taking the bit between its teeth, ran away. She was thrown in attempting to stop him.

Miss Iva Shepherd is rapidly recovering from her broken ankle and will soon be able to resume her work before the camera.

The Yosemite Company, which is under the direction of Hobart Bosworth, is expected to return to Los Angeles at the end of two weeks.

James Young Deer, producer of the Pathe Company, has returned to Los Angeles from a business trip to New York and vicinity. He has brought back two trunks of Indian costumes which he obtained from the Indian reservation in Nebraska, where he went to visit his people.

Miss Virginia Chester, formerly playing ingenué parts, will soon return to the company and will only appear in soubrette parts hereafter. Miss Chester in her unfortunate illness has received the sympathy of the local moving picture people, following so rapidly as it does her recent period in the hospital. She has been operated upon three different times.

The thirty-fourth birthday anniversary of William Clifford, well known in moving picture circles, was celebrated by an impromptu entertainment given by the Melies Star Film Stock Company near Sulphur Springs. Mr. Clifford gave a number of selections, most prominent being "The Bells," Sir Henry Irving's famous work. Mr. Ford was chairman for the evening. Among those present were Mr. and Mrs. Bracken, Mrs. Hale, Miss Midgley, Mr. Stanley, Mr. Young, Miss Nichols and Mr. Haddock.

The Kalem Company is about to stage a number of expensive pictures of rural life. The O'Neil ranch near the ocean, which is said to be about 320,000 acres in area, will be the scene of the pictures.

The Powers Company, of New York, are sending a stock company West to produce Western films. They will erect a permanent studio here about September 1.

Chicago Letter

Chicago Delegates to Exhibitors' National Convention.

At a regular meeting of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' Association of Chicago, held in Franklin Hall, in the Fraternity Building, 19 West Adams Street, Monday, July 17, delegates and alternates were elected to attend the National Convention of Exhibitors at Cleveland on August 1st.

The delegates are: Sidney Smith, of the Garfield Theater; Wm. J. Sweeney, of the Standard Theater, 63d and Halsted, and C. A. Anderson, of the Hermosa Theater, 43d and Armitage.

The alternates are: Louis Frank, of the Halsted Theater, 63d and Halsted; F. O. Nielson, of the Kimball Theater, and C. C. Whalen, of the Washington Theater.

In addition to the regular delegates, it is expected that a large contingent of Chicago exhibitors will attend the convention, as it is desired that next year's convention shall be held in Chicago and every legitimate effort will be made to secure it for the Windy City. A committee of exhibitors will call on the Association of Commerce, of the city, to ascertain what inducements can be offered to secure the next annual meeting.

Last Monday's meeting of the association was largely attended, and it was announced that the membership had reached 220. As there are about 500 exhibitors in the city, it is expected that the membership will increase steadily, now that it has been demonstrated that the organization is in capable hands and that the objects are for the promotion of the interests of exhibitors and the welfare of the picture industry generally.

At Monday's meeting, George Gilmore, of the Ideal Theater, North Avenue and Larabee Street, was elected publicity agent of the association.

Before business of the association was entered upon, W. A. Daniels, president of the National Waterproof Film Company, presented the president, George Henry, with a fine gavel, which was received with great enthusiasm and a rising vote of thanks. Mr. Daniels also gave a short, interesting address, extracts from which will be found elsewhere in this issue.

Winnipeg M. P. Houses are Models.

Frank L. Hough, Jr., of the Kinetograph sales department, of Thomas A. Edison, Inc., made a brief stay in the city last week. During the last eight weeks Mr. Hough has covered Nebraska, the two Dakotas, Minnesota, and points in Manitoba.

In Omaha, Neb., he found business in a healthy state. Nicholas Amos, owner of a circuit of licensed picture houses in that section, is spoken of by Mr. Hough as a gentleman of broad experience, who takes great pains to give his patrons well balanced programs, the bookings being attended to by him personally.

In Fremont, Neb., the Wall Bros. are erecting a modern house that will seat 700 people. It is being built after the design of the Music Hall, Omaha, and special attention is being paid to the interior arrangements, so as to insure the comfort and safety of patrons.

Grand Island, Hastings, Lincoln, Kearney and other Nebraska towns were also visited. Mr. Hough was impressed by the intelligence and enterprise of exhibitors in all these towns and pronounces them "live wires."

In Sioux City, Iowa, where six houses cater to picture patrons, Mr. Hough found business flourishing. The Star, owned and managed by Jack Shortley, offers good programs and fine projection. The operating room of this theater is pronounced perfect by Mr. Hough. At the Majestic, where Jack Melchor operates, an excellent picture is thrown. Mr. Hough tells me that every machine working in Sioux City is an Edison.

In Sioux Falls and Mitchell, both in South Dakota, business was in poor shape. At Aberdeen, S. D., the Idle Hour was offering a strong show that pleased large audiences nightly. Mr. Smithers, who manages this house, makes instrumental music a prominent feature. The Cozy, in the same city, managed by Mr. Jameson, is another successful house. It is on the Idle Hour circuit, as is also the Idle Hour at Watertown, S. D. The latter, which was showing to good paying business and managed by Mr. Wallace, is a finely appointed house.

Fargo and Grand Forks, N. D., were next visited, and business was fairly good. Thence the jump to Winnipeg was made and a stay of over a week was thoroughly enjoyed. Mr. Hough states that he was really surprised to find business in such grand shape, in the Chicago of the Canadian Northwest. Every picture theater is up-to-date in structure, both for appearance and comfort, and the exhibitors are fine types of business men. The Colonial, Starland, Elite, Avenue, Majestic, Dreamland, Grand Pastime Province and Princess run straight pictures.

Mr. Dunbar local manager of the General Film Company, told Mr. Hough that the Walker Theater, playing traveling combinations, showed the Auto Races, by Essanay, one evening when the house was "dark," to a tremendous business. The management reported that there were more automobiles lined along the thoroughfares in the vicinity that night than were seen when Melba gave a concert.

The Colonial, Majestic and Province stand out prominently on the list of the beautiful houses mentioned. Fred Rogers, Mr. Edmunds and Mr. Nash are the respective managers. Manager Rogers takes all pains to make his theater a model in every respect, and the pictures at the Colonial are admirably projected. Mr. Hough states that he could say almost as much for every picture house in the city.

The future of the business is in good hands in the far western sections of the Dominion, Mr. Hough says, judging from representatives met by him while in Winnipeg.

On the way to Chicago a stopover was made at Minneapolis, where "civic week" was being celebrated in true holiday style. Mr. Van Duzee, of the Twin Calcium Light Company, extended his customary hospitality. The rental business controlled by him is in a satisfactory condition.

Chicago Film Brevities.

George H. Greaves, owner and manager of the Princess Theater, Denver, called at the office of the World last week. He was returning to Denver from Pittsburg, where he spent several weeks with his home people. Mr. Greaves reports a fine summer business. The Princess is one of the finest theaters in the country, and cost $100,000. Independent pictures have been run thus far.

Max Lewis, representing the Co-operative Exchange, Denver, and Wm. H. Swanson, of Wm. H. Swanson & Co.'s Exchange, Denver, were recently fined $200 each, by the Sales Company, for releasing the special film, "Grenadier Roland," before release date. This should warn others not to violate the rules of the Sales Company.

Mr. John A. Verhoeven and Miss Mary Teresa Cogan, both of this city, were united in marriage Wednesday, July 19. Their wedding tour will last until October 1. Mr. Verhoeven, of the legal firm of Cooney & Verhoeven, is one of the attorneys in this city retained by the Motion Picture Patents Company.

C. C. Langley, manager of the Globe Theater, San Francisco, recently wrote the following letter to George Kleine: "Your advance bulletins, which we always display in our lobby, have not been received of late. Our patrons are greatly disappointed when they do not appear, and are asking for them, as they have made a practice of reading them and of watching for release dates."

One of Selig's western companies is now located on the Santa Cruz Islands, off the coast of California, in charge of the general manager, Francis Boggs. These islands have been chosen for the production of a series of big marine pictures. Mr. Boggs has taken a flotilla of boats along, among them being a large private yacht, the "Skidbladder," two catboats, a power launch, a motor boat and a three-masted schooner, all specially chartered for the purpose. As there are no accommodations on the islands for visitors, the company will camp out and enjoy themselves in the wilds, while making this series of pictures.

R. C. McMullen, manager of the Colonial Theater, Rockford, Ill., was in the city recently. He states that he showed to paying business throughout the hot weather. The Orpheum, a vaudeville theater with 1,200 capacity, has been closed for the summer, which has tended to increase the business of all the picture houses. Two licensed houses and one licensed airdome and three independent houses are running through the summer.

On making a round of the exchanges, both licensed and independent, it was asecrtained that business fell off in most cases during the hot spell, and that it is picking up this cooler weather.

O. L. Moyer, who recently purchased the Lyric Theater in Elkhart, Ind., called at the office of the G. F. Co. at 117 N. Dearborn last week, to arrange for service. Mr. Moyer will run pictures only at present, but later on intends putting on two or more vaudeville acts. The Lyric is the largest theater in Elkhart and is located on the principal street of the city. It is showing to good business.

J. Dunmeyer, of the Dunmeyer Bros., owners of the Crystal Theater, Muncie, Ind., was a visitor last week. He reports satisfactory business.

Mrs. Charles A. Kimmit, of Park Ridge, Ill., arranged for a service for two nights each week, for her private music hall, with the branch office of the G. F. Co. on Dearborn St.

Louis A. Klene, owner of the Arc Theater, La Fayette, KALEM COMPANY IN IRELAND—Off for a Day Among the Lakes of Killarney.

Ind., passed through the city last week on his home journey, after a visit to his fruit farm, near Corvallis, Ore.

Wm. Pastar will open his new house, the Princess, at Benton Harbor, Mich., Monday, July 24. The Princess seats 425 people. Mr. Pastar arranged with Manager F. C. Aiken, of the G. F. Co.'s branch, 17-19 S. Wabash Avenue, for service, and also purchased a machine and supplies from him.

J. A. Doolittle, manager of the Colonial and Colonnade theaters, Galesburg, Ill., was a visitor on July 18. Owing to a street carnival and a free medicine show in the city, he reported poor business at both his houses.

Manager F. C. Aiken states that for the week ending July 10 the branch of the G. F. Co., at 17-19 S. Wabash, showed the largest volume of business for any week since its opening.

Manager Van Ronkel, of the G. F. Co.'s branch, 429 S. Wabash Ave., informed me that business was quiet during the hot spell, but that it has shown a big improvement during the past week.

Mrs. Charles Plein, owner and manager of the Family Theater, Dixon, Ill, has cut out vaudeville and is now showing three reels daily.

Mrs. Kruger, of the Idle Hour Theater, Dowagiac, Mich., was in the city last week. She is looking for several theaters in contiguous territory, in Michigan, to form a circuit of picture houses.

Maurice Fleckles, manager of the Laemmle Exchange, reports that business was quiet from July 4 until the cool weather set in. Mr. Fleckles is now very well pleased with the volume done.

Julius Stern, who is in charge of the Laemmle interests during the absence of Mr. Laemmle in Europe, visited the Chicago office Wednesday, last week.

A. Sigfried, who owns the Bijou and the Nickel Bijou, Decatur, Ill., and the Plymouth Theater, Minneapolis, was a visitor at the Laemmle Exchange last week. All his theaters are being run during the summer, independent pictures being used. Manager Sigfried is a well-known vaudeville performer throughout this country and Europe, and will be remembered by many as "The Man with 1,000 Faces."

Manager Wm. H. Bell, of the N. Clark St. branch of the G. F. Co., has been taking short trips into Wisconsin, Michigan and Illinois, for several weeks past. He reports that these excursions have been very valuable in giving him a line on present and prospective exhibition conditions. Mr. Bell states that his branch is enjoying satisfactory business, the season considered. He is buying six more reels this summer than at any time during the existence of the exchange, covering a period of 12 years.

George K. Spoor, president of the Essanay Film Mfg. Co., who has been confined to his home for several days past, by temporary indisposition, is able to be out again.

FOREIGN NOTES AND COMMENTS.

According to a French trade journal, the French moving picture has among its patrons some of the most distinguished statesmen of la belle France. Members of the present French cabinet are mentioned.

The exhibitors of Austria have heeded the necessity of organization and recently held a meeting in Vienna, to which the leader of a powerful party in the Austrian parliament had been invited. The members aired their grievances in a very plain and resolute manner and protested against the arbitrary license policy of the government. It seems that an officer of the imperial government had obtained a license, and this formed the subject of much hostile comment, as the law in Austria demands that the moving picture exhibitor must conduct the enterprise in person. The exhibitors wanted to know how the official could comply with the law and at the same time retain his official position. The party leader present at the meeting made a lengthy speech, promising amid much applause to lay the just grievances of the exhibitors before the parliament at the earliest possible date.

Detroit Police Make Rules.

Manufacturers Advised Regarding What They Will "Tolerate" and "What They Don't Want."

Despairing of making exhibitors of Detroit understand what may and what may not be shown in the picture houses of that city, the Police Department has issued a letter of instructions to manufacturers of motion pictures as to what the Department of Police of the City of Detroit will "tolerate" and what it "don't want." The letter reads as follows:

CITY OF DETROIT.
Department of Police.

Frank H. Croul, Commissioner. Geo. A. Walters, Secretary.
July 3, 1911.

Sir: In the past few months, this department has had so many complaints in regards to moving picture film posters, of an undesirable nature, we have concluded to notify you in regards to same; because the majority of house managers claim inability to understand what we desire and what we object to.

It is difficult subject to systemize by rules, for a very fine line is drawn between posters and films, although one fact stands out prominently by which we base our rules.

We call your attention to the fact that a poster is a stationery picture, that is studied by passersby both young and old; consequently making an important asset in the way of advertising; while remembering that fact and giving you the greatest consideration we have to protect the child from the evil seed of crime becoming planted in it's youthful brain; that is the reason why. WHAT IS PERMISSIBLE IN A MOVING PICTURE WOULD NEVER DO FOR A STATIONERY PICTURE, WHICH USUALLY RENDERS A WRONG CONCLUSION TO THE MIND.

We will give as nearly as possible our ideas of what we tolerate and what we object to.

First. Western pictures; if the characerts are in costume we do not object to the display of fire arms, Indians and cowboys fighting are permissible; for it bears on real history.

Second. Battle scenes, soldiers in uniforms, with guns and swords fighting etc. are permissable.

Third. Head pictures, house scenes, western saloons, etc. are permissable.

WHAT WE OBJECT TO AND DON'T WANT.

First. Murders, firebranding buildings, unless it be done by Indians or soldiers. It is a most dangerous of felonous acts.

Second. Pictures of criminals in prison garb, Prison scenes, and escaping convicts.

Third. Attempts of murder, people tied in chairs, gags in or around peoples' mouths, stabbing, holding people at bay with firearms, scenes of choking, and pictures of violent deaths or acts.

Fourth. Blowing of safes, robberies, or any other unlawful or felonous acts.

Fifth. Drinking, tottering drunkards, gambling, duelling, inside pictures of houses of prostitution, suggestive pctures, and scantly draped women.

Sixth. Display of black hand letters, Strikers, Rioters, and a violent destruction of property.

This list of acts comprise the censorship as nearly as we can instruct or explain on paper and you will undoubtedly have no differences with this department if you try to operate accordingly and in conjunction with us.

Yours Respectfully,
Geo. A. Walters.
Per Royal A. Baker.

Putting aside the criticism that the City of Detroit should establish a censorship over the department of correspondence at Police Headquarters, this letter confirms an oft-repeated contention of the Moving Picture World that a higher standard of intelligence should be brought into the work of a censorship board than is usually found among the bluecoated guardians of the peace, however efficient they may be in the discharge of their customary duties.

While their ideas of the fitness and the unfitness of pictures is, in the main, correct, their judgment is faulty in cases where the lines are finely drawn. It will be noted that in the case of the Detroit police the rule regarding the relative effect of still and moving pictures is reversed. It has always been held by critics of pictures that pictures which simulated action were far more harmful when wrongful acts were depicted than were still pictures of the same act. But the Detroit police promulgate the doctrine that "what is permissible in a moving picture would never do for a 'stationery' picture." Thus do the doctors disagree.

Boston

Jacob Lourie, of the Beacon Theater, is certainly full of original and clever ideas. On Tuesday, July 11, the managers assembled at the General Film Company to pick and balance their programs. The heat was "something wicked," to quote one manager, when up spoke the genial Mr. Lourie, "Come, boys, let's each put 10c. into the kitty, and I will appoint myself a committee of one to procure ice-cream and soft drinks." The idea was welcomed, and Mr. Lourie did as promised. And so it was that the Licensed "boys" here had an enjoyable time at the General Film Co. on that torrid morning. "Picking your program while eating ice-cream and drinking ginger-ale is really an excellent pastime," was the comment of one of the men.

Mr. Lourie, of the Beacon Theater, Tremont Street, has made a change in his vaudeville arrangements and is now procuring his talent from the office of Mr. Fred Mardo, having left the National Booking office. This is the first change the Beacon has made in its vaudeville arrangements since its opening.

Austin & Stone's Theater, using pictures and vaudeville, in conjunction with their regular programs, has cut out Sunday night concerts until August 15. The house expects to close for a few weeks, but will reopen before Labor Day. Frank P. Stone, of Austin & Stone, has incorporated his theater recently. The house was one of the very few in New England doing business as an individual concern, as the great majority of theaters hereabouts are incorporated. Miss Lottie Crabtree, well known as a retired actress and as a wealthy business woman, has had an attachment placed on her property. New York architects are bringing suits against her for moneys due them for work done on New York property belonging to Miss Crabtree. Miss Crabtree is the owner of the Savoy Theater, Washington Street, using Licensed pictures. HENRY.

CONVENTION RECEPTION COMMITTEE.

The reception committee of the National Convention of Exhibitors at Cleveland, Ohio, is composed of the following gentlemen: M. A. Lewis, chairman; Foster Simmons, Samuel Bullock, Max Schachtel, C. F. Schroeder and L. W. Fawcett.

WASHINGTON THEATER, GRANITE CITY, ILL.

We take pleasure in reproducing herewith photographs of the Washington Airdome and the Washington Theater, both of Granite City, Ill., owned and operated by the Columbia Amusement Co., of which Mr. Louis Landau, Jr., is president. The Washington Airdome has a seating capacity of 1,814, and the theater 850, to which is being added seats for 600 more.

HAYMAN IN NEW THEATER VENTURE.

A. C. Hayman, formerly of the Actograph Company of New York, is now interested in a new theater project at Niagara Falls, N. Y., with Richard and C. R. Crick and J. R. White, of Niagara Falls, and J. A. Schuchert, of Buffalo. The project contemplates the erection of a first class theater on the site of the old Arcade Theater, Falls Street, and extending to Cherry Street, at a cost of $50,000. As planned, the new house will have a seating capacity of 2,200. Besides playing legitimate dramatic attractions of the best class, the new house will give motion pictures and arrangements to that end are being made with the Kinemacolor Company of America for the exclusive right to exhibit color pictures in Niagara Falls.

Education and Science

THE BEST PICTURES.

Which are the best pictures in the moving picture world to-day? This is an exceedingly easy question; would that it were harder to answer, then argument, analysis, comparison and discrimination would each be called into requisition to assist in forming a judgment.

As it is, the decision is self-asserting. The best pictures are those the scenarios of which were written years and ages before cinematography was known. The few that have been culled from the authors of bygone days have proved most satisfactory, being of the highest possible standard, both in merit and reputation; they met instant approval as soon as their names were mentioned. Is it necessary to give examples? Let an exhibitor advertise as a "coming" "A Western Romance" and "Enoch Arden." Which draws the people and pleases them?

Again, compare results of presenting "Faust" or "Il Trovatore" with any of the newer and cruder love stories, the name whereof is legion. For real sentimentality, "Auld Robin Gray" proved far more attractive than any of its newer would-be associates. "The Tale of Two Cities" certainly outranked and outclassed anything of a similar nature, if a more mediocre imitation can be found to associate with it. What does this prove?

First,—That the best pictures are, as already stated, taken from works of the old masters.

Second.—That the same libraries which gave forth these have thousands of others slumbering in the dust of time, only waiting the light of the moving picture to bring them before the world.

Third.—That the scenarios of the present day are too light, too crude, too strained to compare favorably with those already at hand waiting to be used.

Fourth.—That manufacturers who are hungering to spend good "money for that which satisfieth not" are blind to their own interests, in view of these evident truths.

Fifth.—That none of the standard pictures have roused the ire of reformers or critics, genuine or spurious.

Sixth.—This class of picture has proved more satisfying, pleasure-giving, instructive than any others, being most profitable to the public, the exhibitor, and to the manufacturer.

Seventh.—The decided contrasts herewith presented prove beyond argument the course which is open to all interested in moving pictures, and which they must follow.
be in that light will do well to pursue.

This brief presentation of exact conditions is more than a "straw" to show the drift of the "wind" of opinion, but it is a light shining over a direct path, which those who wish to be in that light will do well to pursue.

It is an unpleasant task for anyone to find fault, besides it is a grievous error to criticise the wrong without also indicating the right. There can only be one class of people who can possibly object to these remarks, and they are the present-day scenario writers. Even they, however, must be wise enough to accept the situation, that unless they can produce that which fills the manifold conditions better than what we already have, they must gracefully acknowledge the truth.

As the mightiest illustrator of the universe, the cinematograph has a world already stored full of matter awaiting its revealing powers to display before the waiting eyes and minds of millions of people. To project a mass of new and cruder matter is injurious; to bring out from the past the wisdom of the ages, the choicest siftings of the world's best time-analyzed themes and reveal them to-day, has already proved, and is daily being proved, as the one way to produce the best pictures.

TESTIMONY OF AN EXHIBITOR.

Editor The Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir.—It is apparent to me that a great many of the moving picture makers of to-day are under the impression that there is a heavy demand for Western pictures by the moving picture patrons.

I am an exhibitor and a student as well, and in a humble manner do I really believe that I concentrate as much thought on the uplift, and the future good of the moving picture business as any showman with whom I have ever come in contact. My studies include topical literature, such as our trade journals and publications of every kind that treat upon the subject of the moving picture business in its various phases. This, however, is only an incidental way of learning the more intricate details of what I consider the world's chosen amusement. The wants of my patrons is the greatest study for me, and one to which I devote a great deal of my time, and I think that I can truthfully say that the majority of the people who visit my theaters do not want an excessive amount of Western pictures foisted upon them.

I quite well realize the fact that there are connected with the moving picture business men of brains, and the success of their heavy investments depends entirely upon the lasting impression their product makes upon moving picture patrons. It is evident that the Licensed manufacturers are making a great effort to outdo each other in the releasing of new and novel themes and subjects, and this being true I cannot, for the life of me, understand why they are increasing the output of Western pictures which, to say the least, cannot leave an elevating influence in their wake. I am only an exhibitor, but my company has an investment of $100,000, and I believe that as president of that company I should make every possible effort to secure pictures that will meet with the approval of the best thinkng people in the respective communities where our theaters are being operated.

I am not a pessimist, but I am a crank on quality, and I believe that the Western pictures and lovesick dramas have seen their day; particularly with the exhibitor who caters to a high-class audience such as I do. When I am in the cities where our theaters are located I mingle with, and am offered the unrestricted courtesies of the most prominent professional and business men, who are my patrons, and I have made them enthusiastic supporters of our enterprise by exhibiting such pictures as would edify and educate.

I realize that there are all kinds of people in the world, and it requires all kinds of pictures to please all kinds of people. I do believe that if the manufacturers, who are located in our large, congested cities where the moving picture patrons are made up principally of foreigners and the American working element, would study conditions in the average American city, they would find that the patrons of the moving picture theaters do not demand pictures such as I have just decried in this letter.

Trusting that this communicaton will have due consideration and that, instead of Western pictures and lovesick dramas, I will have the pleasure of seeing in the future pictures of a high order depictng historical, educational, industrial, scientfic, travel and biblical subjects, with only an occasional Western picture. I am. Yours very truly,

Technique of the Photoplay

Chapter III.

POINTS ON THE SCENARIO.

As will be seen from the scenario presented in Chapter II, the story presents an incident and the matters which follow the outworking of that incident. In this case the main incident is the receipt of the letter offering Dick a position on a Western ranch. Had that letter not been received, he would not, at that time, have proposed to Nell; Horton would not have evidenced his dislike for Dick; he would not have passed the house on his way to the telegraph office, to be drawn into the robbery, actually performed by Bob, and he would not have been in the West to befriend Bob in his extremity. All of the events may be traced to this one.

A dissection of any properly constructed story, whether in fiction or dramatic form, will give the same result. A man picks up a badge in the street and places it in his buttonhole, thereby becoming innocently involved in an anarchistic plot. The picking up of the barge is in itself unimportant, but it gives birth to the story. Juliet's family was at war with the family of Romeo, else the love story of Romeo and Juliet would have differed not one whit from the love stories of millions of others. If the serpent had not tempted Eve, the story of the Garden of Eden would have been the baldest sort of history. The connection may be traced indefinitely.

A Basic Incident Essential.

It follows, therefore, that the first requirement of a photoplay is the occurrence of some incident that gives rise to a series of intimately connected events which lead to some definite conclusion. There may be a number of series of events, all of which lead to one common end, in which event the plot is complicated and less easily followed. In the photoplay the writer is denied the free use of words in which to explain the various ramifications of the story, and it is best to select a plot which offers but a single series of incidents. The more simple the plot, provided that the heart interest and dramatic value are obtained, the more suitable it becomes for photoplay presentation.

In the first scene of this scenario Dick comes to tell Nell that he has a chance to go West and better his position. He asks her hand; she confesses her love and suggests that he ask her father's consent to their engagement. These are the bald facts of the scene, but much is told by suggestion.

It is plain that Dick is a clerk and that his position is a moderate one, else he would not want to make a change for the better. That he is a clehk and not a workman is shown by his manner of dress. Just what sort of clerk he is does not matter. He may have been in a drygoods store or an office, but his previous employment is unimportant. The audience is left to place him according to individual fancy.

Had it been necessary to the story to show that he was in a certain line of employment, the opening scene would have shrown him engaged in the office, store or factory, as circumstances might have required. Since no explanation of this sort is required, the story moves on to the first essential.

Make Relationship Clear.

It is important that relationships be clearly indicated at the start, that the audience may not be left groping in the dark until the unfolding of the action makes this plain—perhaps not until the middle of the story.

This first scene also makes it plain that Nell is the daughter of well-to-do parents, because she is discovered in a home indicating that station in life. She must be very much in love with Dick, else she would not be willing to become engaged to him in the face of other and more brilliant opportunities, and it is evident that Dick's main interest in the better position lies in the fact that it makes it possible for him to propose to Nell. None of this appears in the script and yet the script was purposely framed to make patent these facts. Where the author of fiction stories has paragraphs at his disposal for the indication of character and motives, the photoplaywright must tell his facts in business or in the layout of his scene.

In the same way the character of Bob is shown in scene six. Did he first appear in the library scenes, the audience would wonder why he was robbing the safe. As the situation stands, it is plain that Bob has to get money from his mother, since the character of his father has been made clear in scenes two and four. He is the scapegrace son who has over-tried the patience of his father, and his raid upon the safe is clearly understood without the use of leader.

It could have been explained in a leader that "Dick robs the safe because his father denies him funds," or he might be seen asking his father for money and being met with a refusal. Instead, in the single brief incident, his character is unfolded and the spectator is prepared for the robbery and Bob's subsequent exile and behavior.

What Constitutes a Scene.

It will be noticed that each scene is numbered in consecutive order and that the scenes follow each other in proper sequence. In each scene only such action is carried as is played in a single setting at a given time. This is a point where many playwrights betray their lack of knowledge. They either run their scenes together or divide the action of a single scene into two or more parts.

Many writers state that "James comes out of the house, walks up the street to a pawnshop" as the action of a single scene. Done into proper form: (a) James comes out of the house and walks up the street. He is not followed beyond the field of the camera. This establishes the fact that he has left the house. (b) He enters a pawnshop. These are two distinct scenes taken at different times and should be written and numbered in proper order. On the other hand, some writers accept scene in the dramatic sense of being limited to the action of stated players, a new scene commencing when another character enters. This is sometimes done in the text of Shakespeare, but it is an almost obsolete form. For photoplay purposes it may be accepted that a scene is all of the action occuring in a given setting without stoppage of the camera. Several scenes may be played in the same setting and they will be photographed at the same time, but the camera will be stopped after each distinct scene that the next may be rehearsed or that there may be an interval of blank film to mark the separation of the scenes.

For the convenience of the director, reference is had to the original scene number where it is used more than once, as in scenes three and five, which take place in the "Parlor as in one." The scenes are all made in the same setting. Scene nine occurs in the "Library as in two"; but scene eleven, while played in the same setting, indicates "Back to nine," showing that the scene reverts to the previous setting without an interval of time. The intervening scene merely approaching a window and later be discovered in the house.

Crimes Barred by Censor Board.

Bob is not shown opening the safe, because scenes of robbery, murder or other crimes are not countenanced by the National Board of Censorship, which, however, recognizes the need for showing parts of such action by permitting it where the actual fact is not shown, and where the moral pointed is a good one. Forcible entry, for instance, may not be shown—the breaking of glass and throwing a catch or entrance with the aid of a jimmy—but a burglar may be seen shows Dick climbing into the window to catch the robber.

In the same way, the actual shooting in scene eighteen is avoided by showing the exterior of the saloon, where the loungers are attracted by the sound of the shot and rush in to find Bob mortally wounded. The dramatic moment is not lost, but the unpleasantness of the actual murder is avoided without making it apparent that this avoidance was sought.

It is probable that no objection would be offered to the fact that Mendez draws his knife, but should he stab Bob, the scene probably would be objected to.

The action jumps from the scene of the murder to the coming of Nell, because there is no reason why the events between should be shown. It is to be presumed that Bob was buried and that his family were advised of his death, but these facts do not advance the story and therefore are omitted. The story should move naturally and simply toward its climax unhampered by the introduction of a lot of action, possibly interesting of itself, but which does not advance the story. The events should not be told so hurriedly that the plot becomes hurried and uninteresting, but padding should be avoided, since, at best, the length of the film is limited.

Bust Pictures and Their Use.

Bust pictures, which are enlarged views of limited areas, are useful in determining action that might be obscure in the large scene. It not only magnifies the objects but it draws particular attention to them.

Should the action here shown take place in scene 16 it is probable that much of the action would be lost, but by making the hands and table top larger than natural size, it emphasizes the fact that Bob was cheating by "holding out" cards up his sleeve. It is directed that all hands vanish from the scene, because in the next view Mendez is holding a gun and Bob has risen from his seat, naturally withdrawing his hands from the table.

Many points may be cleared in a five-foot bust picture which would require twenty to thirty feet of leader to explain, and the bust picture always interests. Sometimes in a newspaper illustration a circle surrounds some point of interest, or a cross marks where the body was discovered. The bust picture serves the same purpose and answers, as well, for the descriptive caption that appears under a cut.

Be Brief and Explicit.

The scenes are written out in explicit action without regard to the number of words employed and frequently a word or two will cover action several times the length of another bit which may take ten times the number of words. Scenes should not be so brief as to want detail, but the author should be careful to keep his script as short as possible, both for the moral effect and for the convenience of the editor and director. Every minute action should not be jotted down. It is sufficient that enough be given to enable the producer to understand the general plan of the action. It is his duty to amplify the directions into a vivid scene, and he can best accomplish this because he knows the people who play parts and can cut the by-play to their peculiarities. Each scene should be complete in itself, since the scenes are treated separately and are rehearsed and played without reference to related scenes in other settings, but at best the scenario is little more than a memorandum of the action which is directly concerned in the relation of the plot. Fine writing, word pictures, or prose pastels are not required, nor are they wanted. They tend to confuse the real action and conceal the plot.

Be brief. Be explicit. Be direct. The rest will follow.

Need of a National Association.

As the National Convention will meet in a few days, I wish to say a few words to show the necessity of a National Association of exhibitors. We exhibitors who are doing the hardest work to popularize motion pictures and bring the nickels to the manufacturers, must league together, to have our rights recognized. When I say "we exhibitors" it is that I have purchased a theater to learn for myself the hardships of an exhibitor. We spend money to decorate our houses, to give the cleanest and most courteous service, to advertise motion pictures, and in return we receive from our exchanges films that disgust our patrons and bring us ruin. The big exhibitors who can show a first run are better off, but as soon as the films are a few weeks old the troubles have no end.

My theater is a small airdome in a very small suburban town and as I can give only two shows per night with no Sunday work, I cannot have a first run service. My exchange gave me "Il Trovatore" of Pathe. I spent money to advertise such a feature film. I had visitors from neighboring towns and I had to disappoint them; the film was in such bad condition that my operator refused to pass it a second time through the machine. We had over twenty breaks at the first show. Every day it is more or less the same story, breaks after breaks, bad cuts, whole scenes missing, no titles, etc. Such junk discourages the lovers of motion pictures and ruins the business.

Who is to blame for such a state of affairs?

Everyone. The independent exchanges do not buy enough and the General Film Company follows the same foolish idea of trying to do too much business with too small stock, consequenty the films are overworked and the rush is such that they are not properly inspected.

The exhibitor is also to blame. I mean the greedy exhibitor. He wants to give a long show to beat his competitors and he tries to squeeze five reels in a show of one hour. When an operator has to put on so much speed he cannot take care of the films.

I will say that many theater managers using first runs are very selfish, they do not care who are going to use the films in the future and do not care if they return them in a bad condition. The exhibitors lack the spirit of fraternity, they seem to be jealous of each other, while with some good entente, the business could be made profitable to every one.

The exhibitors must form a National association and be recognized as such by the renters, the manufacturers and the operators. If the exhibitors are leagued together, they can dictate and not be dictated to. The moment that a National association would pass a rule, imposing a fine on each bad reel supplied by an exchange, the renters would be a little more careful to keep their films in a better condition.

Too many girls are employed in the work of inspecting the reels. They sit close together and while both Mary and Jane rewind films, they talk of a coming dance, of a new dress, etc., and do not see bad sprocket holes or other defects. If we can impose a fine for every defective film, the exchanges will soon realize that they have to do something; they will engage more competent inspectors and they will see that each girl sits in a sort of box by herself, be isolated and having nothing to detract her mind from her work.

The exchanges must buy more freely to be able to give better service and have time to inspect the incoming reels. The other day my exchange had the nerve to keep me waiting from 2 to 4:40 p. m. for my service and without a chair or a bench. I was not the only one, several other exhibitors were clamoring for their reels, claiming that they would miss their trains. The renters pay no attention; the men in charge of the service do not hurry, they take their time to smoke a cigarette and the girls at the rewinders stop to chew candy and tell stories. The same day an exhibitor, who had been waiting two hours for a single reel, got a little excited, but was soon called down by the man in charge, showing plainly that the renters have a very wrong idea that they do us a great favor in renting us films, while we are the ones doing them a favor in patronizing them. A National association can change these wrong ideas on the part of the exchanges.

The exhibitors have never been united; they are at the mercy of the united renters of the united manufacturers. If the exhibitors wish to unite they can be, what they should always have been, the masters of the situation. They should be the dictators, as they are the ones producing the nickels for the manufacturers, the renters and the operators.

The National association should fine every exhibitor returning bad reels to the exchanges. Fine every exhibitor urging his operator to run the film above a certain speed and should fine the exhibitor, who for the sake of a few pennies, employs an incompetent operator.

The members of a National association should pledge themselves to take good care of the reels for the mutual benefit of all concerned and should return the reels in as good condition as they wish to receive them. A half hour or so spent after the show would save a two-hour wait next day.

The renters should have extra titles made, so as to not send out films minus the title, and they should order from the manufacturers the scenes that they have to cut out on account of bad sprocket holes or other defects. This the exchanges will do if they are fined for sending out defective films or sending out a supposed 1,000-foot reel, reduced to some six or seven hundred feet.

As long as the exhibitors have no association they have no protection, they are at the mercy of their exchanges, and the renters will not spend the money to keep the films in better condition as long as the exhibitors are easy marks without protection.

THE EXHIBITOR'S LIBRARY.

In the advertising pages will be found the announcement of three books, printed, published and sold by the Moving Picture World at nominal cost to exhibitors who wish to present literary, classical or historical feature films of special note in a proper and profitable manner. In this exhibitor's library is a second edition of the book, "How to Put on the Passion Play," which has a well-established reputation among exhibitors for usefulness and accuracy. A similar book has been printed for the feature films, "Dante's Inferno" and "Jerusalem Delivered." The books will be found useful, if not indispensable, by every exhibitor who wishes to rent any of the features mentioned. Additions to this library for the exhibitor may be made from time to time as occasion will seem to demand. The lectures, which form part of every one of these books, have all been specially prepared by W. Stephen Bush.

Motion Picture Hearing Adjourned

Municipal Explosives Commission Gives Picture Men Two Weeks More to Prepare Objections.

As announced in the Moving Picture World of last week the Municipal Explosives Commission held a public hearing on the new regulations for the storing of inflammable motion picture films at Fire Department Headquarters, 157 East 67th Street last Thursday morning at 10:30 o'clock. Owing to lack of proper notification of the meeting not a dozen persons were present when the hearing was called to order. Members of the commission present were Gen. George O. Eaton, chairman; Peter Acritelli and R. S. Lundy, secretary.

General Eaton stated the purpose of the hearing and asked if anyone present had any remarks to make on the subject. A. B. Graham, of 2 Rector Street, New York, said that he represented the several independent manufacturers and exchanges, and requested that the hearing be adjourned until August 10 to give his clients opportunity to make a more careful examination of the proposed regulations and frame their objections.

In view of the small attendance the Commission consented to the adjournment to 10:30 o'clock, August 10.

The proposed regulations are herewith given in full:

CHAPTER XXXIII.

INFLAMMABLE MOTION PICTURE FILMS.

DEFINITION.—By the term INFLAMMABLE MOTION PICTURE FILMS is meant, a film made of a nitro-cellulose product or other similar substance, used for the purpose of displaying motion pictures for exhibition.

Sec. 1. It shall be unlawful for any person to store or keep on hand any inflammable motion picture films in a quantity greater than ten reels or aggregating more than ten thousand feet in length without a permit from the Fire Commissioner.

Sec. 2. Applications for permits for the storage of inflammable motion picture films shall give in detail the following information:

(a) Name and address of the applicant;
(b) Location of premises;
(c) Other purpose for which the building is used;
(d) Nature of the business in which the applicant is engaged in such building.

Sec. 3. No permit for the storage of inflammable motion picture films shall be issued for any building:

(a) Which is situated within fifty feet of the nearest wall of any building occupied as a school, theater or other place of public amusement or assembly;
(b) Which is occupied wholly or in part as a tenement house, dwelling or hotel;
(c) Which is artifically lighted by any means other than electricity;
(d) Which is a frame or wooden building;
(e) Which is not equipped with an approved system of automatic sprinklers.

Sec. 4. No permit for the storage of inflammable motion picture films shall be issued for any building which does not contain one or more separate compartments for the storage of such films. Each compartment shall not exceed one thousand cubic feet in space area, and shall be constructed upon suitable foundations, having no opening except the door leading into the building, and having the walls, floor and roof constructed of Portland cement concrete at least six inches thick, or brick masonry at least eight inches thick. The bricks to be laid in and covered by Portland cement mortar.

Sec. 5. A compartment for the storage of inflammable motion picture films shall not be artificially lighted except by electric lights having air-tight bulbs, globes or tubes encased in suitable wire cages fitted with keyless sockets. All plugs, switches, etc., shall be on the outside of the compartment and at least four feet above the floor.

Sec. 6. The door for each storage compartment shall be of metal or other fireproof material, and self-closing; and all shelves and fixtures inside the compartment in which inflammable motion picture films are to be stored shall be of metal or other non-combustible material.

Sec. 7. Each compartment wherein inflammable motion picture films are stored shall be ventilated by a flue constructed of concrete and lined with tile pipe at least eight inches square inside measurement and extending from the door of the compartment at a point opposite the door to at least six feet above the highest point of the roof of any building within a radius of twenty-five feet.

Sec. 8. Each ventilating flue shall have an opening into the compartment 4 by 6 inches in area, placed 3 inches below the ceiling, and secured at both ends with 16-mesh brass wire gauze firmly fixed in place.

Sec. 9. All examining, repairing or piecing together of inflammable motion picture films shall be done in a room not used for any other purpose and separated from the rest of the building by fireproof partitions and self-closing fireproof doors.

Sec. 10. Not more than ten reels nor more than ten thousand feet in the aggregate of inflammable motion picture films shall be under examination, repair or handling at any one time, and each reel of films shall be enclosed in a tight metal box when not being handled.

Sec. 11. Each room used for the repairing or piecing together of inflammable motion picture films shall contain a metal can, wherein all waste parts and scraps shall be placed and kept covered with water.

Sec. 12. No collodion, amyl acetate or other similar inflammable cement or liquid in quantities greater than one quart shall be kept in a room or compartment wherein inflammable motion picture films are stored or repaired.

Sec. 13. No heat other than steam or hot water, and no stove, forge, torch, boiler, furnace, flame or fire; electric dynamo, motor hoist or other electric appliance that may produce an exposed spark, shall be allowed in any room or compartment used for the storage or repair of inflammable motion picture films.

Sec. 14. It shall be unlawful for any person to use for exhibition purposes within the City of New York any inflammable motion picture films unless in a machine or apparatus for which a certificate of approval has been issued by the Fire Commissioner.

Sec. 15. (Sec. 48 Chapter III—Bonds and Fees). For a permit allowing the storage of inflammable motion picture films, as provided for in section 1 of this chapter, the applicant shall pay an annual fee of fifty dollars.

Sec. 16. (Sec. 49, Chapter III—Bonds and Fees). For a certificate of approval of a machine or apparatus for the display of motion pictures, the applicant shall pay a fee of fifty dollars.

Sec. 17. A person who violates any of the provisions of this chapter is guilty of a misdemeanor.

In giving notice of the hearing the Moving Picture World called attention to section 16, which, on its face, appears to establish a tax upon the exhibitor using a projecting machine. A representative of the World, present at the hearing, asked Secretary Lundy for an explanation of that section. His reply was to the effect that the section did not affect individual exhibitors, but applied to manufacturers of machines only; also that it comprehended only types of machines and not each machine sold. From this explanation it would appear that there is nothing in the new regulations affecting the exhibitor seriously.

If the regulations go through without amendment a serious burden of expense will be placed upon the manufacturers and exchanges doing business in Greater New York, if they are not driven out of the city entirely. Undoubtedly concessions will be obtained which will prevent such extreme necessities.

Advent of the Topical Picture

Vitagraph to Release a News Film.

The Vitagraph Company are introducing a new series of pictures entitled "Current Events." It is proposed to issue monthly a set of films recording important events wheresoever they may appear. This idea of a sort of special picture newspaper is a very excellent one and will prove a valuable illustrative as well as a historical record, besides filling the pleasing object of giving people actual reproductions of events which previously could only be imagined after reading cold type descriptions; surely we are moving at a marvelously progressive rate. Among the first pictures of this new series is shown President Taft in his recent visit to Brooklyn reviewing the Sunday-school parade, an interesting section of the parade is shown with a full view of the reviewing stand with an excellent picture of the President in the center. Another picture is that of the lacrosse games played on the evening of the same day; here the President is shown receiving the players at the close of the game. These pictures of the President of the United States associating himself with the doings of the people will be acceptable to the lovers of America's sterling democracy. No doubt children everywhere will appreciate the President's presence at one of their festivities.

Another series is that of the observance of a "Safe and Sane Fourth of July" in Indianapolis. While New York had a most unique parade of nations, Indianapolis had one typical of American life, times and customs. The floats and other parts of this parade were not only pretty, but of a high order of illustrative tableaux.

These reproductions are valuable not only as giving all an opportunity to see, but also a chance to know what and how our distant neighbors do things. One of the special features of this film is the deliberate coming together of two locomotives in violent collision.

This thrilling scene, representative of such a death-dealing crash, with its destruction, smoke, steam and attendant conditions seems especially peculiar from the fact that one can witness such a terrifying incident in perfect silence, the lack of noise never seemed so impressive as it does here. Whether such an event robbed of all its usually horrible and deathly results serves any scientific or other helpful purpose remains to be seen; it is, however, a novel picture.

The reproduction of the National Amateur Athletic Contest at Pittsburg is a film that will interest all lovers of field sports. Opening with a view of Governor Tener, of Pennsylvania, in the grandstand, the various events are splendidly portrayed, the clearness and thoroughness of such a series of pictures is a triumph of moving picture work. Throughout the pictures seem perfect, giving perhaps a clearer and more concentrated view of the events than an observer could have obtained had he been present. This is but the second series of this kind of picture the writer has seen, and it would seem that if the results of the contests could also be shown, making the interest complete, one would get a better view of the events than if actually present, the privileged camera occupying a position denied the visitors.

Vitagraph has also a series of baseball illustrations; pictures of this class will prove most welcome. Only a few weeks ago a call was made on this page for just such a class of picture, and this catering for the youth of the schools and colleges will be amply repaid by the evidences of appreciation which will come to the manufacturers.

Projection Department

QUESTIONS ON LAST WEEK'S LESSON.

1. How are lenses polished?
2. How are lenses centered before mounting?
3. What is likely to happen if the mount is too tight?
4. Can lens combinations for the best work be placed a a standard distance apart?

LESSONS ON LIGHT (Continued).

What may be termed the principal function of a lens, as applied to projection, is to refract all rays of light striking its surface, emanating from a given point, in such manner that they all reach precisely the same relative point on the screen. This is illustrated in Fig. 31.

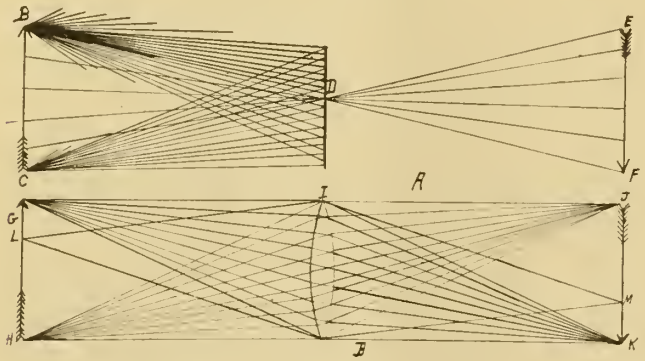

FIG. 31.

In A, Fig. 31, we see arrow BC being projected through pinhole D to EF. Taking the two extremes of arrow BC as example, rays emanate in every dirction, as shown, but only the one ray from each point striking hole D can reach screen EF. This means that, while image EF will appear, it will be compartively very faint, since but one ray from each point of surface on arrow BC is utilized. Such an arrangement would be entirely impossible for ordinary projection. You would only be able to see a very faint image on the screen in a perfectly dark room, if, indeed, you could see it at all with the naked eye when magnified to ordinary projection size. We must, therefore, find some method of projecting the image by which an infinitely greater percentage of the light will be made available, and, at the same time, the sharpness of the image be retained. In B, Fig. 31, we see arrow GH being projected through lens I, the image appearing as JK. Again, rays from every point of surface on arrow GH go forth in every direction, but we take those from the extremes only, as example. We now find that all rays emanating from point G and striking lens I, are refracted to point J, while all rays from point H are refracted in such manner that they reach point K. If we now take a third point, L, as example, we shall find rays from it will refract to point M and so on until every infinitesimal point of the surface of GH has been projected to its exact corresponding point of the image and we have a sharply defined perfect representation of arrow GH on the screen. This, in general, is the operation of the objective lens used in projection. It, by no means, however, tells all the story. To project a perfectly true, sharply defined image, without distortion of any kind, requires a lens of perfectly homogenous substance, of combination crown and flint glass to correct chromatic aberration, and with a surface ground to an absolutely true curve at all points; also having perfect polish. Therefore, you see at a glance some of the difficulties to be encountered by its maker. A study of Fig. 31 will show you why the image on the screen is inverted and its sides reversed, without further explanation on that point.

New York Card.—Baltimore, Ohio, writes: "I understand there is a new form of operator's license card in New York this year, and that it is most excellent. Will you kindly describe same?"

I will do better than that, Baltimore, by publishing a cut of it. The card is indeed a most excellent one from any and every point of view.

Above you see the editor's own card. You will observe that it is absolutely non-transferable, since not only on it appear both the holder's signature and photo, but, also, both are sealed by a portion of the same seal. You will also observe that the card states: "This is not a certificate of ability to throw a good picture." Correct. In no city that I know of is an operator given adequate examination by the authorities as to his projection ability. In fact, most examiners, while probably good electricians, wouldn't know a travel ghost from Mark Antony's whiskers. Of course it is true that some few cities appoint one practical motion picture operator to the examining board, but, even so, the examination is seldom or never such as will determine the applicant's ability to do high-class projection; therefore, it is well that license cards have printed on their face a statement that they are not evidence of competency in projection. The New York card may well serve as a guide to other cities. I doubt if it can be improved upon materially. It is also a most excellent identification at banks, postoffices, etc. It is printed on white cardboard.

Seattle Ordinance.—Seattle, Wash., writes: "At the request of the Managers and Operators Association, an ordinance was introduced in the Council of this city, repealing the ordinance prohibiting the use of motors. In order to secure this concession, the Association was willing to accept passage of an ordinance prescribing very strict regulations governing equipment of operating rooms and the conduct of operators while on duty. The Public Safety Committee, after considerable careful investigation and thorough consideration, was satisfied that, under conditions as prescribed in the ordinance the operation of machines by motor is entirely safe from the standpoint of fire risk, at the same time relieving the operator from much drudgery, which latter in itself has tendency to increase the fire hazard. There is another ordinance covering operating room equipment, etc.

THE ORDINANCE.

Section 1. It shall be unlawful for any person to engage in the operation of a moving picture machine, or electrical equipment for display of moving pictures in the City of Seattle, without first obtaining a certificate of registration from the City Elecrician, as hereinafter provided.

Section 2. Every person, prior to engaging in the operation of a moving picture machine, or electrical equipment for display of moving pictures in the City of Seattle, shall appear in person at the offiec of the City Elecrician and shall there register his name and residence and the place where he proposes to operate any such electrical equipment or machine in said city and make affidavit that such name, residence and place of such operation are correctly stated; and said person shall thereupon be entitled to a certificate of registration from said City Electrician, provided that no such certificate shall be granted for more than the period of one calendar year or the unexpired portion thereof at the time of the granting of the certificate, and provided that no certificate shall be issued to any person under twenty-one years of age, or to any person who has not had three months' apprenticeship in the operation of motion picture machines and equipment for the exhibition of moving pictures.

Section 3. Every person shall, before taking out a certificate of registration, deposit with the City Treasurer of the City of Seattle the sum of $5.00, and shall file receipt therefor with the City Electrician.

Section 4. It shall be unlawful for any corporation, co-partnership or individual, to conduct a place where moving pictures are displayed without complying with the provisions of Section 6 of this Ordinance.

Section 5. All moving picture operators shall be governed by the following regulations: (a) No lighted cigar, cigarette or pipe shall be permitted in the operating room, and no reading matter shall be permitted therein. (b) No inflammable or cumbustible materials, and no explosive chemicals, shall be kept in the operating room; and no picture machine apparatus shall be used in connection with a lamp served by oxy-hydrogen. (c) The operator must be in the operating room while the machine is in operation. (d) No operator shall work more than six hours without one hour relief, and no operator shall work more than ten hours in twenty-four. (e) No person without a certificate of registration other than the manager of the moving picture show, or an authorized city official, or person learning the operation of moving picture equipment, shall be or remain in any enclosure or room in which a moving picture machine is being operated before an audience. (f) All carbons removed from lamp must be immediately deposited in a metal receptacle containing water. (g) The door of the moving picture room or booth must not remain open while the moving picture machine is in operation. (h) Not more than three picture films shall be permitted for each moving picture machine in said booth or enclosure at one time; and no picture films shall be exposed in said booth or enclosure at any time, other than the one film in process of transfer to or from the moving picture machine, or from upper to lower magazine and other than the film in process of rewinding. All other films shall be placed in a metal-covered receptacle.

Section 6. The equipment of every moving picture operating room shall conform to the following regulations: (a) Every moving picture machine shall be equipped with an automatic shutter, so arranged that film is not exposed to light of arc when machine is not running. (b) A top and bottom magazine must be used. (c) All wiring to motors must be in condult. (d) Motors must be enclosed in metal-covered box, asbestos lined. (e) Machines may be operated by hand or by motor.

Further sections provide penalties for the operator who may violate the provisions of the ordinance, ranging from suspension of card to revocation of same; also fine not exceeding $100 or not more than 30 days' imprisonment. The theater owner or manager who fails to comply with Section 6 may be fined $100 or imprisoned thirty days.

This law has some good points; also some which I believe might be improved. Personally, I am opposed to the operator being compelled to put up five dollars for the privilege of earning his daily bread. Provided there be a salaried license board, I do not object to a moderate annual fee, say, $2.00. In this law I see nothing concerning an examination, and, so far as appears, the city simply takes $5.00 from the operator in exchange for a slip of paper permitting him to work. I was under the impression that was precisely what we wanted men to do, viz: work. Certainly we rail at the tramps who will not. Chicago exacts an annual fee of $10, but it at least does in exchange protect the operator to the extent of giving an examination and to some extent weeding out the worst incompetents. Seattle apparently takes $5.00 annually without any protection whatever in return, save the one item of age limit. The issuance of certificates on three months' apprenticeship is something of a joke. Are Seattle men supposed to learn the trade, profession or art (it is something of all three) of operating in three months? But, after all, probably the Seattle men got the best law they could pry loose from the public servants, and it might be added that some cities mulct the operator for a fee without giving examination, fixing an age limit, a term of apprenticeship, or much of anything else.

Iron Wire Resistance.—Lima, Ohio, writes: "Perhaps I can explain to the satisfaction of both yourself and Mr. H. P. Walls, about the fifty feet of No. 8 galvanized wire resistance (p. 35, July 15 issue), as I have had a large experience with resistance devices. The denser or harder wire is, the less its resistance, and, conversely, the softer the wire the greater its resistance. In order to pull 55 ampers at 110 volts pressure, 2 ohms resistance is required. I have handled No. 8 iron wire which gave one ohm to each 25 feet, which would mean that 50 feet would deliver 55 amperes, working on 110 volts. However, the galvanizing itself is an excellent conductor and by using galvanized wire greater length is required because of that fact. If friend Walls had used black iron wire, he would have found that half the amount, or less, would have done the job. At one time I wanted to get 60 amperes and figured it up, using Roebling's table. Found from it the number of feet necessary and made my coil accordingly. On test, like friend Walls, it almost set the world afire. You see, while I used Roebling's table I did not use Robeling's wire. I then wound some galvanized on a one-inch rod and found that commercial galvanized wire, No. 8 size, required 600 turns to cut the amperage to 60. I think the editor is correct about the fifty feet of No. 8, but it was soft, black iron wire. If any one wants to try the No. 8 galvanized, let him get about 13 pounds and wind it on a one-inch mandrill, about 600 turns. Mr. Walls is wrong about the No. 12 wire. It has not the safe carrying capacity. It would get red hot under 60 ampere flow."

Lima, we are obliged to you. I was tempted to say to Neighbor Walls what you said, viz: Your No. 12 has not sufficient carrying capacity. Your letter has brought the whole thing back to mind. You are correct. The galvanizing has high conductivity and, since current tends to keep to the outer surface, it operated to cut down the resistance. I wish some brother who has the time and inclination would test out No. 8 soft, black iron wire and see how much of it will deliver when wound in coils, 30, 40, 50 and 60 amperes, under 110 volts pressure. Be sure of the exact voltage, however, and tell us exactly what kind of wire it is.

Lamp Shades.—Canton, Ohio, writes: "Last week I told you of the shades we use to secure ideal lighting conditions in our theaters, and I promised to send further information as soon as I found out where they could be had. I have now secured catalogue and hand you herewith number designation of several shades, from catalogue of the Erner Electric Company, Cleveland, Ohio, from whom they may be had. The total cost per lamp is about $3.00. I use 25-watt tungstens, but 40-watt lamps may also be used. Cost per lamp will depend somewhat upon how much wire, moulding, knobs, etc., is required for installation. Catalogue designation is as follows: No. 45,945; diam. of shade, 7 inches; silvered, $12 per doz. No. 45,946; diam. of shade, 7 inches; green, $12 per doz. There are also 8-inch shades, green and silvered, at $15 per doz., and 9-inch size (size we use) at $24 per doz., green and silvered. Ours are silvered. Reflector shades is only name catalogue gives. Of course, size of rooms will determine the number of lights necessary. I would start about ten feet from back of house, say 10 feet from last row of seats, and place them about 20 feet apart. For a room 100 feet long, there ought to be about 5 lights. Our patrons say it improves the pictures and the house a great deal.

This shows how they look. The shaded part is green or silvered, as ordered; the bottom is ground glass." The shade is in effect a modification of the lighting plan advocated by the editor in these columns several times. I have no doubt but that it will give excellent results in houses having a tolerably low, flat ceiling. For a house having high ceiling, the shades would probably have to be suspended some distance therefrom.

Experience Wanted.—New York City, N. Y., writes: "Have been devoting much time to the study of projection matters from a theoretical standpoint. I think I understand electrical practice, in theory, very well, but absolutely lack practical knowledge, both in operating and theory. Every day I study operating I like it better and have now arrived at the point where I desire to take matters up from a practical standpoint. How would you adivse me to go about it?"

The only thing that I could suggest is that you make application to a number of houses to be taken on as operator's helper. You will find that, while the study of theory will be of much value to you, it will be a very little aid until you have mastered the practical details, and that will require hard work, study and time. You might possibly arrange with some good operator to take you on as helper.

Locating Operating Room.—Hagerstown, Md., writes: "Will you please advise as to feasibility of changing position about 18 degrees, without distorting picture? (2) Would we be obliged to change lenses or condenser? Please give such information as you consider necessary. We now use 6½-7½ condenser lenses, but are troubled with light brown ghost in upper left hand corner of picture; use Edison machine." of operating room as per floor plan of our house, attached hereto. (1) Can we change location of machine to right side of house, as shown, and reduce throw to 50 feet, angle being

Two 7½ condenser lenses would probably give better results on your present throw. As to the light brown ghost, see if something is not interfering in light somewhere. I cannot say, because you have not even said what kind of current you use, how the ghost looks, what size it is or anything else, except that it is there. As to the other matter (1), you cannot. If you lay the thing out on paper you will find that, with a picture width of 15 feet and a fifty-foot throw, the lens being approximately 19 feet to one side of the curtain center, the light will strike the screen on one side about three feet in advance of the other. In other words, the light must travel that much further to reach the point A on the screen than point B. The picture is 11 feet high, the throw 50 feet, therefore it follows that the light spreads, up and down, 11/16 of a foot to each foot of throw. Multiply this by 3, the added throw on one side over the other, and you find one side of your picture will be 33/50 of a foot higher than the other. This is practicaly eight inches. You would probably have difficulty in securing a sharp focus all over the screen also. (2) You would have to change objective lenses unless you propose throwing a very much smaller picture than at present. In fact, I doubt if you could use the present lens at all. Present condensers would probably answer. Unless there be very strong reasons—very strong ones, indeed—for making the change, I would advise you to retain your operating room in its present location. You could, of course, get a good picture, without distortion or other trouble, in the new location, by bringing point A of screen forward toward the machine about three feet. It would not look well, however. In any event, before making the change I would set the machine in its proposed new location, on a temporary platform, run temporary wires, and try it out. If you do this I think you will conclude not to make the move.

Spokane Union.—Spokane, Wash., writes: "Just a line from the new union, 235 I. B. E. W., of Spokane. We all read the Projection Department, but very seldom see Spokane mentioned. No. 235 has 14 members and is growing. Have been organized four months. Have had quite a fight with the other local here, No. 185 I. A. T. S. E. Hope to win out sometime in the near future. Projection is very good in this city. Ten houses run straight pictures, while three run vaudeville and pictures. One additional vaudeville-picture house opens Sunday. Wages are fair—$25.00 per week, six hours a day. Our local will not accept an applicant unless he be a real operator, and the local stands ready, like Frisco, to back its members with cash guarantee. Election of officers occurred last week and the following were successful: President, Ed. Paden; vice-president, A. G. Hayes; manual sec'y., and treasurer, D. V. Cushman; recording sec'y., J. P. Paden; presiding sec'y, H G. Mapes. All the boys read 'The World' and like it. They all send best regards."

I am indeed sorry to hear of the trouble in Spokane. I know nothing whatever as to the merits of the controversy, bue surely there is enough to do improving conditions, perfecting projection and like work, to waste time and energy fighting each other. Both the I B E W and I A T S E are great, grand organizations. Each has done a splendid work in its appointed field, and doubtless will do more in the future.

Small Town Location.—Washington, D. C., propounds the following: "I intend to open a picture theater in a town of 1,500. Please advise me what will be the cost of remodeling a frame structure, capacity 200; also how many people would be required to conduct the business, without vaudeville? Would I have to secure State rights or a permit for a town in Virginia? Is it safe to buy a second-hand machine? Do you think the house could be made to pay? Has any one ever tried such a proposition?"

I would recommend that you immediately send $1.50 for a handbook and on pages 162-163 you will find this very proposition discussed at length. I cannot possibly give you any intelligent answer as to cost of remodeling since you have not told me of the slightest detail of the building. Much will depend on how elaborate your ideas for decoration, etc., are. You can get good seats for $1.25 to $1.40 each. Possibly you might get second-hand ones for considerably less. You will have to have an operator, piano player (unless you use a gramaphone), a ticket seller and ticket taker. These four people are indispensable. So far as I know all you will need will be a city license. Houses in towns of that size have been run profitably, in a small way. I take it, however, that you are totally without experience in the show business. Better be careful. There is something to the show business, as you will speedily discover, besides taking in the nickels or dimes. It is safe to buy a second-hand machine, provided you are a competent judge of its condition. Don't get stuck with an old, worn out, out-of-date model, however.

Film Buckles.—New Castle, Ind., writes: "Have had some trouble with my Motiograph machine, though I do not altogether place the blame on the mechanism. Some films buckle as they pass the aperture, producing an in and out of focus effect on the screen. Have experimented several ways, but, to this writing, have been unable to locate the trouble. Trust you will give me a hand."

If the tracks on aperture plate are worn much, get a new plate. See to it that the tension springs are held tight and do not move from side to side. Very dry films will often buckle as they pass under the springs, even when everything is in perfect condition. I do not know just why they do this, but the fact remains that they frequently do.

Wants Advice.—New York City writes: "I hand you herewith wiring diagram of a theater in this city. Would like your opinion of same. I am not allowed to make any changes and am expected to give first-class results, but this I find is impossible. One reason for this is the film service, which is the cheapest the house can get. The films are junk. I am also troubled with a double spot on gate. I set my carbons as close to your directions as I can and they burn as C, Fig. 33, page 88, in your handbook, so I believe my carbon setting is correct. Am using A C with Hallberg economizers. The line side is marked 15 am, which I do not think is enough, although I am pulling current through 30 am. 125 v. fuses, which in turn pull through 40 am. and 250-v. fuses at the mains in operating room. This method of fusing is not clear to me. By sketch you can see that my spot is cut in just ahead and on the same switch block as the moving picture machine, it is also fused with 30 am 25 v fuses, but the economizer is marked on the line side 20 am. Both economizers are hooked up from the middle connection on lamp side, 40-45-50 am. for the moving picture machine, 30-35-40 am for spot. The machine is a Standard. Am using two 6½ inch condensers, the projecting lenses are marked 4½, the throw is 75 feet and the picture is 18 feet wide. The house has an orchestra, balcony and gallery and the operating room is in the top of the house, being hung from the ceiling over the gallery, consequently the throw is very sharply downward, the machine setting at about an angle of 40 degrees."

It is not to be expected that you can get first-class results from junk films. You can only project it in such manner as to display it to the best possible advantage. Try changing condensers. It may or may not eliminate the double spot. If your carbons burn as per Fig. C, page 88, of the Handbook, they are right. The double spot is sometimes a puzzling thing and its cause hard to determine. Usually, however, the fault is easily located. Possibly the lower carbon burns away too much in front, thus exposing both craters directly to the condenser. Try setting lower tip just a trifle further ahead. See to it that your condenser lenses sit square with each other and that they are centered with each other. As to the sketch: if you have correctly set matters forth, you have 125 v fuses working on 320 v current on the two cutouts between the main cutout and the economizers. That is very much wrong, but does not in any way affect your projection current. The economizers are on 220 volts pressure, therefore 15 amperes at that pressure will supply more than 90 amperes at the ordinary A C arc voltage, viz. 35. The cutting in of the spot lamp ahead of the projection lamp cutout makes no difference if the wires between the point of connection and the main cutout are large enough. In this case they are. Your projection arc, when pulling 50 amperes, takes less than ten amperes from the 220 volt line, while the spot takes even less. No. 6 wire is rated at 46 amperes. Everything except those 125 v fuses seems to be O. K., except that your operating circuit and spot circuit fuses are heavier than they should be and don't offer much protection to the economizers. To figure amperage taken from line, through an inductor, or economizer, proceed as follows: Voltage multipliled by amperes gives watts. The watts on line and lamp side will be equal, plus any slight loss in the economizer. If you are using the 50-ampere notch multiply 50 by 35 (about the voltage at an ordinary A C projection arc, though it may vary considerably), which gives 1,700 watts. Since the wattage on line and lamp side are equal, if we now divide the lamp wattage by the line voltage the result will be number of amperes taken from the line. Remember that this is only approximate, however, since to get accurate results one must know exactly the arc voltage, also exact lo s in the economizer. And there you are. So far as the wiring is concerned there is no reason why you should not get good results on the screen.

From San Antonio, Tex.—San Antonio writes: "Am sending you herewith copy of permit issued to operators of this city. Most of the better operators think this but a graft on the part of the city, just as being compelled to have a $14 a week man on the door to act as special officer is. That, the managers think, is the biggest graft of all. They think these special "officers" entirely unnecessary. I agree with them in that respect. If the "officers" could be done away with, possibly the managers might be able to add a few dollars to the operators' salary. Getting rid of this needless expense has been tried without success, however. If the managers would get together and push the thing to the limit something might be done. But one manager waits for some one else to start something. Naturally the net result is 0000. Mr. Lytle, manager of the Wigwam Theater, did try, some time ago, to do something. His intentions were the best, but when he informed the others that each would have to put up $25 to fight the matter, a goodly number of them immediately developed bad cases of cold feet. Some agreed, but others simply could not bear to separate themselves from the twenty-five. As to the operator's permit: when such an ordinance is passed in a city of this size you can form your own conclusions. Every one here reads 'The World,' therefore I hope to see this appear in its columns."

New York City, with 500 motion picture theaters, finds no need for a "special officer" at their doors. Neither does Chicago, with fully as many theaters. Graft is an ugly word, but surely it would seem to fit, on that particular proposition, in San Antonio. It would also seem that if the managers are compelled to pay out good money every week for a useless ornament in shape of an "officer" they could well afford the small sum of $25 if by its expenditure there appeared reasonable hope of eliminating the ornamental expense. As to the permit: I could not pass judgment without knowing more concerning it. In Chicago a license costs the operator $10 per year, but that is an outrage, pure and simple, particularly as the board of examiners is not, or was not for a long time, at least, and I believe are not now, paid one cent of salary. In New York operators must pass examination and be licensed, but there is no fee attached. The San Antonio fee seems too small to be worth bothering with, even by grafting politicians. Therefore I am inclined to think the intent of the law is honest. In San Antonio I should say that receipts from permits could not exceed, at the very outside, $50 yearly. Permit in question reads as follows:

"Motion Picture Operators' Permit, Office City Electrician, San Antonio, Texas. Permission is hereby given Mr.....to operate a moving picture machine in the city of San Antonio, in accordance with an ordinance passed and approved June 27, 1910, regulating moving picture shows. This permit is not transferrable and must be exhibited by the owner of same after being duly registered in the office of the City Electrician. Fee paid for permit, 50 cents. Age of holder..... Residence of holder..... Place of employment..... Signed, W. A. WHITE, City Electrician.

A False Alarm.—A few weeks ago I received a request from Claremore, Okla.. for five high-class operators. The letter was apparently bona fide, even the equipment being described in considerable detail. Thinking to do our friends a favor by enabling some of them to secure what appeared to be very good positions, I published the request. It was signed by one S. H. Ports (or Parts, as the name is written I am not sure which), who claimed to be Chief Operator and Electrician for the Lyric Amusement Company of that city. Operators from all over the country responded, both by letter and telegram. I forwarded 69 letters and 7 telegrams to Mr. Ports (or Parts), but fortunately did not send any of the many valuable letters of recommendation sent in, making copies and returning the originals to their owners. In all the matter consumed much time and postage, to say nothing of the expense and bother to those who sent in applications. Weeks went by and I heard nothing from Mr. Ports. Thinking this strange, I finally wrote the Lyric Amusement Company, Claremore. Reply has just been received from manager of the Lyric Theater of that city. It appears a Mr. Berry had intended putting in five houses in different towns near Claremore and asked this man Ports to get him some competent men. The Lyric manager says: "Mr. Ports skipped one day recently and has not been heard from since. He proved to be very unreliable." From this I take it Ports was the operator at the Lyric in Claremore.

Granted that Mr. Ports really thought the positions would be made, he had absolutely no right whatever to advertise it as a fact until the matter was finally and definitely settled. I do not think he did this thing maliciously, but the fact remains that he has caused much inconvenience and trouble, to say nothing of some expense, and then has gone away without a word. The editor feels he has no apology to make to the friends who answered the call. The matter was so apparently straight and bona fide that he had no reason whatever to doubt its genuineness. If our friends suffered some expense and trouble in the matter, the editor was put to fifty times as much. I am publishing this so that Mr. Ports can be looked out for, and you can take it from me that future requests of that kind will be examined with a magnifying glass before receiving space in the department.

Operators Call.—Three of the Baltimore boys, one the president of the Baltimore Union, paid the editor a call last week. Was very much pleased to meet the brothers and enjoyed their visit immensely. They report union affairs as prosperous in Baltimore. Also Mr. Fred S. Ecker, operator for one of the Lyman Howe shows, paid us a visit. We enjoyed a pleasant chat with brother Ecker.

Address Wanted.—Mr. Herman Kliyeske, 613 South 14th Street, Sheboygan, Wis., wants to know of a theater in Milwaukee, or vicinity, using an Edengraph machine. Will Milwaukee kindly supply the desired information? Write the gentleman direct.

Lens Trouble.—North Yakima, Wash., writes: "The right side of my picture is out of focus for about two feet. Machine is centered with screen. Have tried every way I can think of to find the trouble, but without avail. Am getting a new lens, but don't know if it will do any good. I enjoy the projection department very much. Have made a scrapbook from it."

The cooling plate being too far to one side will, where it sets out from the gate considerably, causes an out-of-focus effect, but it also causes a shadow at the side of the picture. Your question can best be answered by asking other questions. Are you sure nothing interferes in the light? It doesn't strike the lens hole in the operating room wall, does it? Are you sure both lens combinations are screwed into the tube squarely and that the rings holding the combinations in their mounts are set up tight? Does turning the lens half over affect the matter? Is one of the aperture plate tracks worn down more than the other? Do both tension springs set squarely on the aperture plate tracks? Is the left track worn more on one side than on the other? Is the machine in line from arc to front of objective lens? Any one of these things might cause such an effect as you describe.

Shutter.—Etowah, Tenn., writes: "Can the shutter described in the department in May issue be used on Edison Exhibition Model machine? Please send me paper pattern of same. I have had two years' experience as manager, but have sold out and am now operating for Manager W. B. Hazelwood in a nice, up-to-date theater in this city. Would like to learn all I possibly can about high-class projection."

Better send in $1.50 for the Operator's and Manager's Handbook, for sale by the Moving Picture World. From it you can learn a great deal. If you mean the shutter described on page 1189, it cannot. On page 1348, December 10, 1910, issue appears photograph of an Edison Exhibition Model equipped with three-wing, outside shutter. The operator did the job. Whether or not you could do the same thing depends on your ingenuity and mechanical skill.

Celluloid.—Princeton, N. J., writes describing the process of making celluloid and says it is rendered incombustible by a process involving the use of alcohol, ether and ferric salt. He then continues: "Glad to see the growth of the Moving Picture World, the operator's best friend. Do I understand that the Film Index is to go with the Moving Picture World for $3 per year, or how is the matter arranged?"

Making celluloid has already been described in these columns and also in the handbook. There is no longer a Film Index. It is combined in the Moving Picture World, which is now twice the size it was a year ago. Its subscription price always was too low and has been increased to $3 per year.

Too Indefinite.—Selma, Ala., writes: "I am having some trouble with, I choose to think, condensers. I suppose they are to blame as I fail to get as good results with my equipment as I should. We use: Current, D. C., from motor generator set, 40 to 50 amps.; machine, Powers Six; distance, 75 feet; size picture, approx. 13 x 16½; carbons, ⅝ cored top, ½ inch solid bottom; screen, as recommended by Chas. Keiwert Company, aluminum in rear, thin sheeting sized with white glue one inch in front, boxed in with tin painted black; drop from machine to center of curtain, approx. 9 feet. Just what combination of condensers would you suggest as being likely to give the best results? I thing I have tried all of them but the right one, from the indifferent results I have—that is, indifferent as compared to what I should get with the current I consume."

I am sorry, Selma, but you are too indefinite. Please describe minutely in just what respect the results are unsatisfactory. Probably it is not the condensers at all. I cannot be of much assistance without exact information. Give me that and I will do the best I can. Two 7½ condenser lenses ought to be all right, as you have about a 4½-inch E F objective. You might try one 7½ and one 6½, however.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

..The Vitagraph monthly film of current events will be released first week in August, showing the head-on collision between two locomotives running at the rate of sixty miles an hour, occurring at Indianapolis, Indiana, under the auspices of the American Association of Locomotive Engineers. On the same film, pictures of the American Athletic Association games of the National Championships will be seen. These games were pulled off at Pittsburg, Pa. In addition to these two subjects, President Taft's review of the Brooklyn Sunday School Union, and his attendance at the Crescent Club La Crosse games in Brooklyn, and the safe and sane Fourth of July parade at Indianapolis will make this an up-to-date issue.

"The One Hundred Dollar Bill," which the Vitagraph Company will issue the early part of next month, is the genuine article. It gives us a chance of seeing a whole lot in a great city and opens up to us the highways and byways of the flotsam and jetsam which most persons are anxious to see, as a matter of information and knowledge as to how the other half lives.

"The Bell of Justice," an early August Vitagraph release, gives a wonderful manifestation of animal instinct. A horse that has been treated unkindly by his master, rings the Bell of Justice set up in the market place, at Moscow, Russia, and demands the recognition and fair treatment he deserves for services rendered. This is a historical incident, and will be a great attraction to hold the young, and interest the grown-ups, in its magnificent scenery, and unusual incidents. Besides the horse ringing the bell we are shown the faithful steed, strainng every muscle, carrying his master and mistress in a sled through a wilderness of snow, out of the reach of a pack of pursuing and ravenous wolves.

COMING GREAT NORTHERN FEATURE.

A military film entitled "A Traitor to His Country" is announced for release August 26th by the Great Northern Film Company. This war drama contains a thrilling and appealing romantic plot, finely portrayed by actors of the Royal Theater at Copenhagen. The Great Northern people consider it is quite a feather in their cap to procure the services of star performers of that calibre, as it brings the picture patrons in touch with genuine artists.

THE NEW DEPARTURE.

Plans for the Milano Reels and "Dante's Inferno."

It is highly creditable to the intelligence and enterprise of Mr. Jacob Shubert, of the well-known theatrical firm of that name, to be the first in recognizing the value of the highest type of moving picture for the big theaters in the country. Such glory and profits as belong to the progressive pioneer are his just due. Mr. Shubert on behalf of the firm of which he is a member has signed contracts for the presentation of the great Milano films production "Dante's Inferno" at a number of his theaters beginning on August 14th at the Auditorium, one of the largest and best located theaters in the city of Baltimore. The other party to the contract is Mr. P. P. Craft, who signed on behalf of the Monopol Film Company of New York. The terms granted to Mr. Craft are quite as favorable as those made with the best attractions in the country.

It must be gratifying to the friends of the moving picture art to know that the presentation of the great film is in competent hands. All rehearsals will be under the personal direction of W. Stephen Bush, who has also been engaged to lecture on the reels. It is intended to make a special effort with the musical program and much is expected as a result of such effort in the way of strengthening the attraction. The advertising will be done in a dignified and becoming style in harmony with the nature of the production, which is to be shown. An artistic program has been prepared with a key making it easy to understand the general plan of the picture.

Special letters to the Roman Catholic churchmen will be issued and, in fact, an invitation will be extended to every person interested in literary or educational work. Mr. Mozart, a veteran in the art of promoting and publicity, will have partial charge of the advertising campaign. It is intended to have rehearsals for a full week to insure a faultless and smooth production.

It is interesting to learn the views of such an able and experienced manager as Mr. Jacob Shubert. He saw the reels in the Casino Theater under somewhat inauspicious circumstances as far as projection was concerned.

Mr. Shubert said: "This is a stupendous production and must have cost an immense amount of money, not to speak of the art and skill required. It will afford a full evening's entertainment. I believe it will easily gain the endorsement of the very best people in every community. It appeals primarily to the educated, it is true, but it can be made attractive to the masses as well, if you reach out for them intelligently. Music is needed of course, but I think the picture will stand or fall with the lecture. Without a lecture it will fall as flat as a pancake. The titles, too, need some revision."

Even before Mr. Shubert spoke of the titles the manager of the Monopol Film Company felt the necessity of re-casting them from beginning to end. The task was entrusted to competent hands and to-day the titles are plain and clear and wherever the poet has been quoted the quotations have been made accurate in every syllable.

Memphis, Tenn.—The Majestic Amusement Company, of this city, will add two more theaters to their circuit in the near future.

Interior New Arcade Theater, La Grande, Oregon.

Interior Star Theater, La Grande, Oregon.

Colleen Bawn.

Released by the Yankee Film Company, Monday Aug. 21.

The English-speaking, theater-going public are well acquainted with this beautiful Irish tale made famous by song and story. Its first production in New York City was at the Laura Keene Theater, on March 27, 1860. Among the people who participated at that time were men and women whose names since that day have become famous in the theatrical world: Dion Boucicault, H. F. Daly, Laura Keene, Mme. Pnisi and Josephine Henry are but a few of the many who are still lovingly remembered by the old timers. The story is too well known to need repeating, for where can you find a man, woman or child who does not know dear old Father Tom, Myles na-Copaleen, Hardress Creegan, Danny Mann, Eily O'Connor, Anne Chute, Sheelah or any of the other well-beloved characters.

After much study and labor the Yankee Film Company have reproduced in motion pictures this well known play. An effort has been made to adhere as closely as possible to the original play by Dion Boucicault and Laura Keen, and the result is an ambitious production that will recall pleasant memories of the old timers and prove a delight to the eyes of all who see it.

"The Artist Financier"

Just before going to press we were invited in to have an advance peep at one of the latest Rex releases, "The Artist Financier." Rex is noted for odd stories. Everything they do seems to be somewhat different from anything that anyone else does, which is said by way of compliment. As every good artist or musician has a touch of his own, so the Rex product has an individuality. We are getting so that we can tell one of Edwin Porter's pictures without being told, as we could his handwriting after having seen it a number of times.

A Kentucky colonel, in speaking of different brands of whiskey, once said that they were all good, but some were were better than others. This applies to Rex pictures; they are all good, but some are better than others. In the very worst of the Rex pictures, if such a thing exists, there is the same redeeming, artistic trait. One can always be sure of something in any of the Rex products, and that something can best be summed up in the one word "quality."

"The Artist Financier" is a quality picture, with a very unique story. The idea of reading a set of plans through a spy glass at a quarter of a mile distance is putting the screws down pretty hard on the imagination. But who cares about such trifles as that, if all the rest of the story is charming enough? We are not sure at this moment whether such a thing is possible, and not being of a mechanical turn of mind, we are not going out in a field and try it out with a glass to see.

The story is about an artist who was painting the portrait of a millionaire's daughter with the usual results of no portrait and a deep-rooted love affair instead. This was discovered by the young lady's father, who forbade his daughter to finish sitting for the picture or visit the studio. But in his specifications he forgot to mention the telephone, and thereafter the lovers communicated by wire. The lovers were obliged to sit and gaze at each other at some distance across a river. One day, while our hero was disconsolately moping around the home of his dearly beloved, he ran across a surveyor with his tripod and transit, one of those things that looks like a telescope standing on three legs. He gave a look through the transit and there he could see on the other side his adored one seated pensively beneath a tree. This inspired him with the idea of making a long distance portrait.

Arrangements were made over the telephone for her to pose on one side of the river while he on the other side would paint her portrait through a telescope. The second portrait never was finished. Why? Because her father and a couple of railroad promoters came along and frightened little Miss Muffett away. They unrolled a lot of plans, never suspecting that our hero was taking them all in through the telescope. He could see that the barren ground upon which he was standing was soon to be bought by a railroad company. With this valuable inside information under his hat the artist became a financier in a moment. He hurried away and borrowed all the money he could get. Then he bought up a large slice of the property before even the cruel father of his lady love had a chance to bid for it himself. By this clever stroke, the young artist held the key to the situation. They had to come and "see" him before they could start any railroad. Among others who was obliged to come and "see" him was the cruel father of his lady love. The young lady's father was decidedly nonplussed when he saw that the penurious artist, whom he had considered a poor match for his daughter, had gotten the best of him in a big financial deal. Like a good American father he quickly decided that any young man that could beat him at his own game was good enough to be his son-in-law.

The story has the saving grace of being new, even though it does call for the stretch of imagination in the telescope episode. It has never been proven that a man could not paint a portrait by squinting one eye and looking through the telescope with the other, but personally we should not like to try it ourselves. Outside of that, it is a good story, amusing and well photographed all through. The interior settings are in extremely good taste, and some of the outdoor scenes are positively refreshing.

WILL HANDLE YOUR PUBLICITY.

The Motion Picture Publicity Company is the name of a new concern located in New York, organized to handle the picture advertising of any manufacturer not equipped to take that end of the business himself. It will write and print bulletins, booklets, circulars and display posters.

H. B. REYNOLDS SECURES STATE RIGHTS.

The New York State rights for "The Temptations of a Great City" are now controlled by Mr. H. B. Reynolds, Room 803, 145 Forty-fifth St., New York. He has taken over the extensive amount of correspondence pertaining to the picture from the Monopol Film Co., who control the American rights to the picture, and all of the applicants will no doubt hear from him in the very near future. The advertising matter for this picture is much above the ordinary run of moving picture poster work. All of the color work is from the Courier Lithograph Co., of Buffalo, N. Y., who are noted for their ultra fine quality and freedom from garishness.

For managers who are desirous of doing something out of the ordinary at this time of year, which is generally supposed to be the slack period, one of the best moves would be to get in touch with Mr. Reynolds and secure the rights for their city or vicinity for "The Temptations of a Great City." It is one of the strongest moving picture melodramas that has ever been turned out. The advertising is superb, and with the proper amount of energy expended, it should draw crowded houses even at the dullest time of the year.

KINEMACOLOR PICTURES AT GARRICK.

The success made by Lyman H. Howe at the Garrick has caused considerable excitement among the owners of large theaters throughout the country. To show pictures during weather that raised the mercury to 102 degrees in the shade, and average about $5,000 gross per week was a feat worthy of extensive heralding.

The Studebaker, following the example of the Garrick, has now been offering a picture show since July 17, when the standing room sign was out. Business still continues excellent and, as Mr. Howe closed his engagement at the Garrick, Saturday, July 22, it is likely that the Studebaker will profit by it. It is said that Nixon & Zimmerman, theatrical magnates of Philadelphia, are financing the Studebaker show.

The Kinemacolor Company has secured the Garrick and opened with the coronation pictures, in natural colors, Thursday, July 27. It is said that the company will continue kinemacolor programs throughout the summer.

MIRRORROIDE.

A Flexible, Metallic Surfaced Screen.

From the Benjamin-Genter Company, Newburgh, N. Y., we have received samples of a rollable curtain with a bright metallic surface. Its reflecting power is all that could be desired; in fact, we know of one exhibitor who is using it in an airdome with success when he could not show on an ordinary screen without using a canvas roofing. For the store show it is possible to project a brilliant picture and at the same time have the place so well lighted that a newspaper can be read. The mirroroide curtain has other qualities. It is waterproof, it can be washed down with a stream of water, it can be polished and brightened by rubbing. It is free from creases and there are no streaks in the coating such as seen in the screens that are coated with aluminum paint. The price seems very reasonable—$2.50 per square yard—and screens may be ordered any size, ready to hang. A large plant has been installed at Newburgh and it looks as if they will be kept busy, as the merits of their product become known.

CURRIER WITH WESTERN SONG SLIDE EXCHANGE

Mr. Fred C. Currier, formerly of the Chicago Song Slide Exchange of this city, has resigned his position with that firm and has taken over the proprietorship and management of the Western Song Slide Exchange. Although the "Western" concern is a comparatively new one, it has been a thriving business since its beginning and Mr. Currier is confident of the success of his new undertaking. Mr. Currier has been in the moving picture game for years and is experienced in all its branches. He is popular and well known among the moving picture public of the city and will receive their best wishes for success and prosperity. F. R. M.

TOPICAL SUBJECTS BY ECLAIR.

The Eclair Film Company announces that it will shortly release a picture of the National Convention of Mystic Shriners recently held at Rochester, N. Y. It is also announced that this company has secured exclusive rights for motion pictures of the Asbury Park Baby Parade, which event will occur later at Ashbury Park, N. J.

Work on the American factory and studio of the Eclair Company is progressing rapidly. In anticipation of an early opening of the new plant the several directors, Messrs. McGill, Rising and Larry, have engaged a staff of players and reheasals will begin shortly for the first production to be offered.

A NEW NAME.

There have been several cases of parties having won prizes on a simple thought or inspiration; for instance, a young man thought of the word "Imp" for the name of a film manufacturer and received a twenty-five dollar prize. Another man out West received a one hundred dollar prize for the simple word "Photoplay." Still another case of a party receiving a handsome prize for the much advertised word "Uneeda," a name now worth millions of dollars.

If our readers will turn over the advertising columns of this issue they will notice that a manufacturer having the facilities of turning out two high-class productions, one popular drama and one novelty or educational film is advertising a prize contest of $50, given out as follows: Twenty-five dollars for the first prize, fifteen dollars for the second and ten dollars for the third prize for the best name of this new brand of film. Send in your thoughts now, for who can tell but that you may be the fortunate winner of one of these prizes. The judges of this contest will consist of the directors of the Motion Picture Distributing & Sales Company. This contest closes on September first.

THE HAPPY THEME'S THE THING.

That film producers. leastwise American ones, are rapidly enlightening themselves to the superiority of the happy over the sombre picture theme, is evidenced every time one reads a film synopsis. The tawdry and top-heavy film plot is persona non grata at most studios today, and it seems that the best producers are really going out of their way to turn out work that is free from the disagreeable. A good instance is furnished in the film story of "The Pied Piper of Hamelin," soon to be released by the Thanhouser Company, where the producer had a quantity of versions to select from, none of them very pretty in their finish. This was due to the ripe age of each, their common source being a legend centuries old which wound up as old legends will, with a heavy, horrible "lesson" by way of moral. By walking away with a small army of children, a certain man—the Pied Piper,, in fact—was to make their dishonest parents feel real bad. But modern ingenuity and modern plain common sense changed all that. The film producer had to send the Hamelin tots away after the Piper, to conform with the main thread of the lengend—but he showed that the Piper was a human being with some very human emotions, and that a plea put to him by the right party in the right way got the right result. As the right result meant the restoration of the children to their parents, it was the logical ending for the film, and Thanhouser is to be commended for having it that way.

"BY THE HOUSE THAT JACK BUILT."

Many of the characters in the Imp film, "By The House That Jack Built," will be recognized by children eveyrwhere. Quite a number of the fabled creatures mentioned in the nursery rhymes appear in the story in their supposedly true characters and the innovation is pronounced a success. The story, according to the Imp Company, has for its central theme the dream of a bond girl. Her trip to fairyland, riding on the white horse with the old lady of Banbury Cross, her meeting of the prince, the son of old King Cole and her subsequent bethrothal and marriage furnishes a pretty story that will be enjoyed alike by old and young. It is an elaborate production, with a large cast of characters and splendidly staged and acted. The tableaux are beautiful spectacles, the whole making a very enjoyable film.

TOM MOORE'S ENTERPRISE.

Since retiring from the exchange business, Tom Moore, of Washington, D. C., has developed into a real "live wire" exhibitor. His circuit of picture theaters now comprises eight houses, with a good prospect of being increased in number to fifteen or twenty before September. While busy extending his interests in new houses, Mr. Moore has not lost sight of the necessity of securing business for those already in operation. How he proposes to accomplish that end will be understood when it is explained that he has contracted for 16 full-page advertisements in the Washington Sunday Herald. The Moving Picture World is in receipt of a copy of the first page ad, published Sunday, July 16. We have seen Montgomery's half-page ads, but this broadside announcement by Tom Moore goes them one better. The type display is excellent and interest in the announcement is strengthened by half-tone views from the pictures; all of which is very effective. While offering no criticism on the layout and subject matter of Moore's fine ad, we would suggest that he use a coarser screen for his half-tones, as the screen used is a bit too fine for use on print paper. In all other respects the ad. is great and if Moore does everything else on the same lines his future will contain nothing but success.

Sherlock Holmes, Jr. (Rex)

People at the Fourteenth Street Theater applauded little Helen as "Sherlock Holmes, Jr.," more than they did the vaudeville acts and that is going some for a picture play. They laughed, too, all the way through the comedy. I suppose Mr. Porter, of the Rex Company, should be credited with the laughs. The situations were funny, but I think Helen Anderson is a wonderful child actress. She makes no mistakes, looks the part, and plays it as well as any of the grown-up children do theirs, and I mean those over twenty-one at that. There was fun and lots of it from the time the kid Sherlock got an idea into his curly head that he could detect. He detected everything including a spoony couple, and showed that he was cut out to be a Central Office man for fair by taking graft to keep quiet about it. He detected the fat cook pouring hookers from the sideboard decanter and reported to his dad, who had been credited with a printer's thirst for strong drink. Dad put up a job on the cook by providing some knockout medicine and fixed the decanter with a dose of dope in Sherlock's presence. After Dad had gone, it occurred to the bud detective that it might do the rest of the family good and he therefore poured some of the anti-bun in the tea about to be served to guests on the veranda. Everybody went to sleep; papa and mamma with Maizie and Georgie on the porch and fat Biddy with her cop in the cookery. The cop had laid aside his articles of war—pistol, club and handcuffs, and Sherlock, Jr., appropriated these for parade purposes.

Scene from "Sherlock Holmes, Jr." (Rex).

Hist! The child's mischievous tendencies had brought about a serious situation. Two real thieves approached this burglar's paradise. The whole family was asleep on the porch and the trusty scout in blue was snoring in the kitchen. What a cinch! It was easy—so they thought, but Sherlock, Jr., was on their trail. Armed to the teeth with the sleeping policeman's weapons, he followed stealthily, keeping "under cover of darkness" every moment. It looked very much as though the thieves would get away with the swag, but they stopped to take a nightcap. They drank heavily and left the house, Sherlock ever on their track. Out in the woods the dope took effect, and Sherlock made a clever capture while they were sleeping by handcuffing their feet.

It is one straight laugh all through, Biddy getting her share, and a big hand at the end, but I think that little Helen —with a respectful bow to Mr. Porter for training her— drew most of the applause. S. M. P.

AMERICAN-BORN ESKIMO GIRL PLAYS LEADING PART IN SELIG FILM.

"The Way of the Eskimo," a Selig film that will be released some time this month, is the first of a series of pictures made by Selig in the far north last winter. This film will possess a peculiar interest for all, from the fact that the leading part has been taken by a young Eskimo girl of American birth, and that all the other characters—with the exception of two American trappers, who were impersonated by regular Selig actors—have been sustained by Eskimos.

Columbia Enuteseak is the name of the Eskimo maiden, her Christian name being due to the fact that she was born during the World's Fair in Chicago, eighteen years ago. Mrs. Potter Palmer, at that time holding a prominent official position in connection with the exposition, acted as godmother to Columbia. Several years later the girl was sent to New York, where she received an excellent education at the expense of prominent people, who were interested in her welfare.

Miss Enuteseak is a bright, intelligent young lady and could easily be mistaken for a girl of American blood. She has proved herself a clever actress, as her work in this unique film will show.

LUCKY ESCAPE FROM DROWNING.

The sad death by drowning of Albert Brighton has hardly been recieved when news comes of a similar accident, although this time there was a lucky escape.

The opening scene of the Solax Company's release entitled "A Gay Bachelor," of Aug. 23rd, takes place at the beach, where the bachelor, played by Gladden James, is enamored of a gay summer girl in an up-to-date bathing suit. During the rehearsing of the scene no one noticed the tide was rising quickly. Mr. James, unsuspectingly, was leaning back in his chair close to the edge of a small wharf. The play was on, the camera began to click and Mr. James became lost in admiring a beautiful pair of silk stockings. At the critical moment James jumped up and tripped on his chair and before anyone realized it, fell headlong into the water. Stunned by the fall and not being able to swim, he bid fair to follow the unfortunate Brighton. Strong arms, however, came to the rescue and all had a good laugh.

Managing Director Melville hurried home to develop and look at his film. He says it was the most realistic piece of acting he has ever seen. As the accident was averted, the Solax Company have decided to release the film as originally intended on August 23rd.

the innocent prospector. Many cowboys and miners take part in this chase. The photography in some of the scenes might have shown the faces better.

"Making Mother Over" (Kalem).—This is another of the Bertie pictures. He gets his mother down from the farm and he and his wife have her wrinkles massaged out and get her fixed up, so that instead of looking like a farmer's wife she looks like a woman of fashion. Father, who is waiting for her at the depot, doesn't know her. His wife wasn't that sort of a critter. In many of its scenes it is very amusing, though father's makeup when seen near the camera was too artificial.

"A Favoring Current" (Gaumont).—In this picture, somewhat out of the beaten track, a girl's lover is lost at sea and she marries another. Years after she is reading some of the old letters in the park near where her husband is making paper boats for their child. The supply of paper runs short. The little girl picks up one of the letters, carries it to her father, who makes a paper boat of it without looking at it. A favoring current bears it away where it can do no mischief. There is a tense moment, however, when the letter is placed in the man's hand. The background of this picture is a pretty park scene well photographed, like all of Gaumont's outdoor films.

"St. Malo and the English Channel" (Gaumont).—We have on this film a series of excellent pictures of this point on the coast of France which is known to many tourists. It is a granite island connected to the mainland by a causeway, and the surroundings are very picturesque. The mechanical work is well done and an interesting as well as educational picture is shown.

"A Society Mother" (Gaumont).—The ambitious, society mother of this film forces her daughter to marry a wealthy drunkard and brute, and she has to drag out a miserable existence because if she leaves him it will endanger the family's social position. The suggestion in the film is far more impressive than the story itself, though probably it will recall to mind instances of the same character within the experience of some who see it.

"An Amateur Skater" (Eclipse).—A better title for this would have been "An Inexperienced Skater." The comic experiences of this "amateur" made many laugh heartily. It is like other French films of this kind; but it goes Max in his adventures on roller skates one better. The actor on the skates was much too big for the boy's part he played.

"Satan on a Rampage" (Eclipse).—Satan comes up from a very realistic Hell and makes trouble for Paris, and on his return to Hell takes not a few people back with him, including a woman with whom he has fallen in love. The film has some extremely well made pictures; some of them are even startling, of red fire, and in particular one red scene where smoky but hot-looking torches give just light enough to show the heads and shoulders of the demons who bear them. Satan's work in Paris is mostly the sudden creation of amusing situations by very cleverly accomplished magic. The photography is excellent.

"The Hair Restorer and the Indians" (Edison).—The strength of this comic picture is in its characters rather than in the development of its idea, which, though very amusing and fresh, has a disappointing climax. The stranded theatrical company decides to make money selling fire-water hair-restorer to the Indians. It proves popular and makes the Indians want scalps. The thespians, with hairy wigs on and traveling to the next stand are overtaken. The result is much funnier in expectation than in reality. The Indians are satisfied rather than surprised or scared and later the troupe is seen walking on the railroad homeward. It is somewhat out of the ordinary and is very commendable.

"Bob and Rowdy" (Edison).—Bob is the very human little boy (Yale Boss) often seen in Edison pictures, and Rowdy is a new bull pup, rather destructive, like most of his kind, and inexperienced, but none the less attractive. Bob loved the dog, but his mother, sister and the cook, a very inquisitive and forthputting individual, dislike him, and their situation and its outcome, as shown in this picture, makes an unusually delightful and human story, wholly commendable except perhaps that the character of the cook, as shown, was not convincing nor original enough to be very funny. Taken as a whole, this picture is very good.

Temple, Tex.—Frank Lucas, Mgr., Majestic Theaters No. 1 and No. 2, has closed No. 2, due to light business, but will reopen about Sept. 1. In the meantime, No. 1 is doing a flourishing business.

Independent

"A Quarter After Two" (Imp).—There is a fine, human idea presented in this picture. The picture is well acted, also; but it is too long and neither the drift of the action nor the relationship of the characters is made clear soon enough. The true burglar, the character who made the incident possible, wasn't introduced till we see the ghost or vision of his wife who comes to him in his hiding place, and then the play is nearly ended. Again, we couldn't see any reason why the sick nurse shouldn't have gone to sleep, because no one overheard the doctor say that the sick child should have his medicine every hour. The burglar heard that, but we didn't know that he did, though we saw that he had recently lost a child and was sorry that he had entered that house. Finding the nurse sleeping, he gives the child the medicine and so saves its life; then he goes home. But it isn't plain whether the incident has reformed him or not, nor do we know who the other man is who at the beginning and end of the film comes in yet apparently has nothing to do with the story.

"The School Master's Overcoat" (Ambrosio).—The work of the actor who plays the school master in this rather pathetic picture deserves very high commendation. Every gesture, his attitudes, facial expression and walk consistently picture a clear and well-defined individual. This man is scholarly enough and kindly hearted, but poor and perhaps weakly sensitive. He doesn't cut much of a figure among his associates and the boys play pranks on him, but at home he has a friend in his old mother. She sits up late making an overcoat for him and even the new overcoat makes another occasion for laughter in the school. The mother is taken sick and to buy her medicine he finds it necessary to pawn the overcoat, and one of his pupils sees the transaction and buys it back for him. This gives an opening for a scene showing that the pupils really saw something fine in the character under the awkward exterior of the master and both respected and loved him. The last scene pictures the school unanimous in showing its affection.

"Marine Views Along the Shore of Naples" (Ambrosio).—There is an unusual pictorial quality in these views of ocean and shore. They are not markedly educational, but one or two of them have caught the atmosphere of some moment so marvelously that many an artist might learn a lesson from them. This is particularly true of a scene just before a storm, showing white waves breaking on rocks.

"A Forest Romance" (Reliance).—The photography of this picture is so poor that it largely detracts from the story's interest. Some weeks ago this company released a picture called "All Alone" and there is a similar atmosphere in this picture which also has the same background, a wide tract of second-growth forest. The stranger in this picture persuades the trapper's only daughter to run away with him and they get lost in the forest. The woman is injured by a fall and the man deserts, leaving her with neither food nor water and she dies. The man is met by the trapper and swears that he hasn't seen his daughter. It is a very tragic picture.

"All Aboard for Reno" (Solax).—There is hardly a dull inch in this farce. It is played at double speed, which helps to keep it lively, but it also is full of new situations. The photographer's posing of Mr. Biff and later of Mrs. Howard was amusing; but this trouble was chiefly due to the office boy who carried the packages with the pictures—he mixed those photos up. The situation is originally handled and in a fresh and breezy way. The picture while not wonderful is surely very funny and is doubly welcome just at this time when the weather is warm.

"Just For Her Sake" (Imp).—An emotional drama of extraordinary power is presented on this film. Its single noticeable defect is in its photography and it is a pity that a picture so well conducted and so effectively acted should be so wanting in pictorial quality, should be so flat. The plot isn't new. Two men working in the same bank love the same girl. The successful one becomes a defaulter and the unsuccessful one shields him, because of his wife and child, taking the blame on himself. The defaulter knows the real reason for this act and, as a perfect punishment, it preys on his mind till he goes insane from jealousy and remorse and shoots himself. The innocent man is released and in the end marries the widow. We have seen something of this before, but not so completely nor so effectively. There is nothing in the picture that is not effective except perhaps the very first picture of a college room. The acting of all the play's characters is very remarkable but the scene where the defaulter confesses, the scene in the president's room immediately after, when the hero accuses himself, and the scene where the defaulter hands a confession to his wife that seems half an accusation of her, and then half-mad kills himself stand out clearly—they are wonderful. The effect of the last scenes softens the tragedy and leaves the impression that here is a love well-proved and worth while.

"The Charitable Young Lady" (Itala).—This emotional and well conducted picture tells, by means of excellent acting the old, old story of the poor love cast off by the painter who has become famous and has fallen in love with a wealthy and fashionable woman. This version has a fresh and more effective ending than usual. The lady, who is charitable, finds the deserted young mother and learns that the father of the child is her own fiancé. She dramatically brings him to the poor lodgings and the baby, when he knows it is his, brings him back to his first love.

"Sherlock Holmes, Jr." (Rex).—There is plenty of good fun in this fresh story of a small boy's exploits. He was Sherlock Holmes, Jr., and he made plenty of trouble for the household, including the cook and the cook's friend, the cop; but he landed a brace of burglars. It is a picture that demanded good acting to make it truly funny and every player in it from the chief character, the small boy, to the cop, the cook and the crooks, do splendidly.

"Two Little Girls" (Thanhouser).—This is one of the prettiest pictures that has appeared, in this reviewer's estimation, in many a long day. The Thanhouser company is strong on poetical plays with children in important parts and Marie Eline is its little queen of trumps. It is quite impossible to describe the quality that makes "Two Little Girls" what it is. The Thanhouser kid is simply wonderful in her portrayal of the unknown stepsister, a patheitic little figure, ragged, weary, almost starved, watching from afar the children's May party and the dance around the May pole. You see, the other, younger sister had found her, made friends with her as children will, and had promised to bring her out a piece of cake. She had a tiny locket about her neck with her father's picture in it. Her father supposed both her and her mother, whom he had divorced, dead. When the other sister comes from the party and takes her home, the locket is the means of identification.

"Sergeant Dillon's Bravery" (Solax).—This is an exciting, well conducted, and, taken as a whole, convincing picture of life at an army post. Those players who are soldiers conduct themselves like military men and the character of Lieut. Mason and that of Serg. Dillon are very possible, as are the lieutenant's crime and his plot to have Dillon suspected of it. Dillon's escape might have been pictured better, but the story is exciting enough to make most minds willing to accept this as it is. The Indians alone were poor; they looked like darkies with wigs. The heroine has an engaging personality and acted well. It makes a pleasing picture.

"The Cheyenne's Courtship" (Bison).—This film will have an honorable place in the Bison series of pictures showing Indian life and customs. It is both educational and interesting. It covers more ground than others of the series and, perhaps consequently, it is weaker and lacks the dramatic consciousness of the best of them; but it shows more. For one instance, in this picture is shown the snake dance ceremony on choosing the new war-chief when the old leader lies dead. In this there is a reminder of that most fearful and marvelous of myths, the Iroquois legend of Artotaro.

"When East Comes West" (American).—Here is a story of a Western woman's jealousy for one from the East. It is a character study and is interesting.

"A Matrimonial Affair" (Nestor).—Here are the popular favorites Mutt and Jeff, in a matrimonial affair which begins in an innocent little advertisement informing a waiting world that a widow with $100,000 is looking for a manager. Of course, these two interesting individuals get into a funny mix-up over it. The lady suspects a joker and induces the black cook, properly painted, to impersonate the widow. Mutt is getting in his work admirably when Jeff arrives and hides under a chair. Shortly a tumult breaks loose in which both the long and the short of it are ejected from the house in no uncertain manner. Sadly they return to their cramped lodgings ruefully view their disfigured countenances and as they shake hands vow to "never again." This series of Mutt and Jeff pictures introduces a fresh comedy interest that promises to be as popular as the drawings have been.

"A Doll's House" (Thanhouser).—Some years ago, Madame Nazimova, the great Russian actress, was advertised to appear as Nora in Ibsen's "A Doll's House" at a theater in Chestnut St., in Philadelphia. A special matinée had been announced for Monday, and just about two o'clock a long string of baby carriages surrounded by crowds of small girls was making its way in the direction of the box office. It was all due to the misleading title. It is not to be supposed that the film will escape a similar fate at the hands of the public and perhaps some exhibitors. As a matter of fact, "A Doll's House" is a very bad translation of the original Norwegian, which really means "The Home of the Puppet." In either translation as well as in the original, a wrong impression is produced, for the play is one of Ibsen's strongest dramas, written before he began to make the stage a pulpit of morbid pessimism.

The most that can be asked of a film maker who attempts to render this play into moving pictures is an ability to convey the central idea of the drama to the average mind, which latter would never know the play either through the book or through the stage. That much having been accomplished in the present instance, all imperfections are to be treated with great leniency. The action in the film starts out fortissimo, when piano would perhaps have been more effective. What could have characterized the relations between Helmer and Nora better than the very first scenes in the drama? With a few fine but powerful touches, Ibsen shows these relations, as Nora, loaded down with Christmas parcels, comes home coaxes him from his work, teases him about the secret present for him and draws from him demonstrations of his fond and indulgent regard for her. The value of the play lies in the revelation of the hidden depths of Nora's character. Nora is married to a commonplace sort of a man with hollow conventional views of honor and duty. She is, or thinks she is, passionately devoted to him. He falls sick and Nora learns from the doctor that the husband's life is lost unless he goes South at once. Italy is the country mentioned. It costs money to travel from Norway to Italy and stay there for health's sake. Nora is poor, so is her husband. Nora's father is a man of means, but is in a dying condition and Nora fears that to ask him for the money would excite and might kill him. A money lender is approached by Nora and is willing to advance the money, if the father will go security. Nora, carried away by her frantic anxiety to hasten her husband to Italy says nothing to the father and forges his name on the note. She quickly gets the money, they go to Italy and shortly afterwards Helmer returns with his health completely restored. The fear that Helmer, who is very prim in his morals, might hear of her forgery haunts Nora, who toiling late into the night has begun to pay the usurer back. Nora dreads discovery not for her own sake so much as for the sake of Helmer. She in her romantic fancies imagines that Helmer will in case of detection absolve her from all guilt and heroically assume all blame himself. The forgery is found out by Helmer and instead of climbing on the pedestal, which the romantic flights of Nora's mind had erected for him, he stays on the solid, stolid earth and just about refrains from calling the police to have the woman he overpetted, "his lark" and "his squirrel" and "his little bird" arrested. He begins to spout morality, bemoans the possible disgrace to himself, talks about Nora's unfitness to be with her children and refrains from driving her out of the house simply to avoid scandal. It is enough to turn one's stomach to see the ungrateful "cad" go on in this stye for some time. In the mean time Nora has painfully discovered the clayey nature of her idol's feet. Before the latter is quite through with his moralizing the money lender returns the incriminating paper and Helmer becoming aware of it at once shifts his ground once more. He has the colossal assurance to tell Nora that he has forgiven her, for doing a technically criminal act to save his life and expresses his willingness to take her back into the doll house and begin the petting all over again. Here the play rises to a climax that will ever stir red blood in man or woman. At no pains to disguise her loathing for the cowardly man, to whom she had been married, she turns her back on him, not with the hot heart of vengeance or anger, but with the coldness of deep disdain.

It is a fine story and, said before, if enough of it can be made by the picture to convey the general outlines the film maker is entitled to due credit.

The last act is well done and the last act is the most important. To show the trip to Italy and the sojourn there was perhaps not necessary and the space devoted to that purpose might, it seems, have with better effect been used to make the relation between Helmer and Krogstad a trifle clearer. The dancing incident at the ball is not quite plain to one who has not read the play. These criticisms are offered with becoming diffidence and solely with a view of throwing out a hint, that may possibly be of some value.

The reel as it stands to-day cannot fail to please exhibitor and audience and redounds to the credit of the Thanhouser Company.

"Little Girl" (Powers).—Here is a highly emotional film, telling the heart story of a man disappointed because the girl he loved married another. She was abused and died because her husband deserted her. Their little girl was sent to an asylum. The former lover, desiring a child to gladden his lonely hours, adopts one from the asylum, and by chance gets the daughter of the woman he has loved all these years. One day she discovers a photograph of her mother the man has cherished and cries: "That is my mamma." The man has not known before. She came to him under her asylum name. The picture closes with him looking at the child and musing upon the ways of fate that lead in unexpected paths.

"Mutt and Jeff at the Fortune Teller's" (Nestor).—Another of the Mutt and Jeff films, showing what happened to the unfortunates at the fortune teller's. Little Jeff gets a good fortune, but what happens to Mutt is enough to make anyone insane. His frantic efforts to obtain something satisfactory from the "She loves me, she loves me not" results disastrously for florist, vegetable man, furniture man, and others. The close, an adventure with eggs, is a fitting ending for what proves to be a hard experience for Mutt.

"The Stranger in Camp" (Solax).—Here is a film which tells the trial of a young woman who married a brute and was forced to leave him and go West to make her living. She teaches in a mining camp and one of the miners falls a victim to her charms. Later her husband appears on the scene and troubles seem likely to overpower her. But the husband, stimulated by jealousy, undertakes with the assistance of two greasers to put out of the way the young miner who protected her from his insults. She rides for the sheriff and the posse arrives in time to prevent a lynching. In the melee the unworthy husband is killed and the way brightens before the young school mistress.

"Outwitting Father" (Yankee).—Willie's father learned of a proposed meeting of his son and his sweetheart and decides to meet her himself. She hears of his intention and prepares a surprise for him, substituting a colored girl for herself. The old gentleman disguises himself and goes to the trysting place. To his surprise he is permitted to kiss the girl and is really having an enjoyable time of it when the real sweetheart appears. The one he has been kissing raises her veil and discloses the grinning features of a black girl. History does not mention what Willie's father said.

"Plucky Bill" (Lux).—In this farce we witness the adventures of Bill, in his attempt to get three hats in large boxes to the milliner's. He wrecks a café and the hats and is badly used in other encounters. Upon relating his experience to his wife she starts with him and the former persecutors get theirs. The next day Bill is so impressed with the way his former tormentors flee before him that he returns home and vigorously declares that his wife must become more obedient to him hereafter.

"One Good Turn Deserves Another" (Lux).—This good story tells how a girl, taken into the family of an uncle, is upbraided by her relatives for her modern propensities, including cigarette smoking, billiard playing and flirting, but when the bank in which her uncle's funds are deposited fails she shows that she has a fortune and saves him from ruin. Then she discloses the fact that she wanted to be loved for herself, not for her money, hence her little deception. The good aunt relents and clasps the girl in her arms.

"A Daring Deed" (Champion).—Here we have a Western film filled with sensations. The scene is a lonely station in the mining country. Just as the agent is closing up for the night a dead box is brought in. Later the lid of the box begins to rise and as Bill rubs his eyes a pair of wicked ones look into his. Bill immediately places all the solid things at his command upon the lid and wires a hurry message to his sweetheart, an operator down the line. No answer, but shortly he gets a reply and tells her the story. Meanwhile the "dead" man's pals, the "mourners," have arrived and are beating down the door. She mounts her horse and rides directly into a dance, tells the story and almost instantly the cowboys are off. They arrive none too soon, for the door has been battered down and Bill is in a hand to hand struggle with the assailants. A shot rings out, one falls and the rest are captured. The supposed dead man goes with the others. Bill and the little girl are clasped in a long embrace. This picture has all the thrills which are supposed to belong to a Western film and it tells a good story in addition.

"The Plains Across" (Nestor).—This Western story tells how an Indian boy, through gratiture, saves the life of a little girl, and, in fact, the lives of a number of white settlers. It is a domestic tale of travel over the plains when Indians were dangerous. The little white girl who is lost is helped by an Indian lad whom her mother had befriended. The story ends happily with the little girl safe at home and a new view of an Indian's character presented. The photography is of the Nestorian quality, adding materially to the interest of the picture. It is a good plains story, too, relieved with character studies which add to its attractiveness.

"Two Mothers" (Reliance).—It would have been easy to have spoiled this picture, which as given is very effective. The idea has been used many, many times, but is one that never will grow tiresome so long as it is freshly conducted and acted for it deals with some of the deepest needs of the human heart. The clandestine marriage of the son of the house with the pretty governess is revealed by the stork when the son is away at college. The grandmother is not reconciled till her own younger child dies and the grandchild is laid in her arms. It is wisely conducted and commendably acted.

"The Kind-Hearted Brother" (Great Northern).—A romantic picture of the Italian Mafia's power and method is shown in the development of this story—it is unrealistic, but effective. The evil-hearted brother tries in many ways to ruin his kind-hearted brother, but is exposed and brought to justice in the end. The story makes an exciting melodrama, well-acted and acceptable.

"Science" (Imp).—The purpose of this picture seems to be to give more light on the question of vivisection. It is a truthful, sincere statement, dramatically presented, of a chosen incident and pictures the accidental death of a pretty puppy under an anesthetic and the consequent distress of the mother dog. Every tragedy is a picture of suffering, but every tragedy suggests in some measure a human escape from suffering. It is humanely educational. The principal of this tragedy is one of the dumb brutes, the poor mother dog. She has nothing to do with the causes of her sorrow and perhaps learns nothing from it. Her part in the picture is not without its pain and apprehension and to a certain extent the makers of this picture placed themselves in the same position with the vivisecting scientists. Of course the puppy wasn't killed, but the mother acted as though she was very much afraid something fearful was about to happen. The picture is dramatically effective up to the point of the puppy's supposed death. It's a very unusual picture and very well acted.

"Won by a Foot" (Imp).—The idea behind this picture is the same as that behind the recent Edison, "A Comedy of Understanding," but it is developed in a different way, is a more effective picture because it appeals more strongly to the elemental.

"The Pretty Lady of Narbonne" (Eclair).—There is a very old story worked up prettily in this picture of a shepherdess and a nobleman who flirts with her, and a moral and paternal king who forces the noble to marry this lowly tender of sheep. The player who takes the part of this shepherdess acts at the wedding as though she was to the manor born, but such conduct was not an impossibility in such a girl. The usual happy ending makes the picture acceptable.

"Exchange" (Champion).—There is no doubt that this picture gets across pretty effectively in most of its scenes; it is even exciting; but it wasn't conducted to make a strong appeal to intelligent spectators, nor ones who are generally informed as to conditions during the Civil War. It is a breezy picture with two or three stirring battle scenes. The idea behind it is not new.

"The Cowboy's Deliverance" (American).—This story tells of a fight between two cowboys, and later the accidental shooting of one, for which the other was accused. He escapes and hides in the cabin of the dead man, his wife protecting the hunted cowboy from the searchers. Later they tell her what has happened and she returns to the cabin to seek revenge. But the broken pistol fails to explode and the cowboy is saved. The gun play and the riding are features that please the crowd.

"The Stepdaughter" (Yankee).—Here is a story of a child who was ill-used by a stepmother, until her father discovered the real state of affairs and ordered the woman from the house. Later she learns of the illness and suffering of the stepmother and brings about a reconciliation. The woman's heart is softened toward the little motherless girl after that. It affords a happy ending to a disagreeable story.

"Oh! Baby!" (Powers).—The idea in this comedy picture is worked up so freshly that the picture stands out, in this reviewer's estimation at least, from all other comedies and so-called comedies he has seen this week. It is a very simple, plotless story, but amusing in its picture of the tantalizing predicament of the man who has agreed to watch the baby for the baby's aunt, for a minute. The minute becomes very long, while the aunt is taking a pleasant stroll with the man's rival.

"The Thrilling Powers Fire" (Powers).—We have been waiting for it and now we have seen it. Its chief interest lies not in its excitement, though what picture of a real fire is not, but in the fact that it shows the destruction of so well-known a picture studio and plant. It also shows a long piece of film still on the rack which went through the fire without being destroyed.

"Silver Wing's Dream" (Bison).—The chief interest in this instructive picture is the wedding ceremony, or the giving away of Silver Wing by her father, the chief, to the man who fought bravely against the Mojaves and whom the tribe thought dead. He was only badly wounded. Silver Wing's dream led her to him and she brought him in. The only question is, how far did Silver Wing walk in her dream? If it was only a few hundred yards, why didn't the men bring him back? Because of this unconvincing part the picture seems the weakest one so far of this Bison series of Indian stories, which is both interesting and instructive.

"The Smugglers" (Thanhouser).—This is an unconvincing romantic picture, which in spite of certain drawbacks when considered as a picture of human possibilities, is interesting and quite pleasing. It is very well acted and in this is its greatest charm. Perhaps not every one would see at once that the district attorney would not be interested in such a smuggling case, or indeed in any smuggling case; that is the care of the collector of the port. Its worst fault is that the picture of the ward's being compelled to help her guardian smuggle the gems in doesn't convince us as a picture of American life to-day. It is, however, not impossible as shown. Many of the scenes are very pretty.

UNFAIR COMPETITION IN JACKSON, TENN.

A very interesting situation has been brought about in Jackson, Tenn., by the opening there of a free, open air moving picture show. A joint protest that has been made to the city council by two exhibitors, Capt. W. D. Ament, proprietor of The Elite, and D. L. Williamson, proprietor of the Mallow, reveals the fact that this free show is no philanthropic movement, but a money making scheme. Its promoters have secured a permit to show the pictures in the city's Court Square park, so that paying no rent and having very light operating exepenses, they find substantial profit in the advertisements which they throw upon the screen. On those grounds, it is claimed that the permit should not have been granted to the free exhibitors, since it permits the use of public property by individuals to the great harm of other citizens engaged in a legitimate and useful business. Again it is claimed that these free exhibitors are pirates in the moving picture business and that the pictures they are showing are nothing more than one might expect at a "free" show, which in trade parlance is known as "junk." The question has not yet been decided, but Capt. Ament and Mr. Williamson are determined to make a hard fight for their rights.

FLICKERS.

Chattanooga Chamber of Commerce has rejected a set of moving pictures taken to boom the town. How is it possible to take a moving picture of a comatose town?

* * *

To those who have never been in Chattanooga, the pith and subtlety of the above question will be entirely lost.

About the only chance a film actor has of getting himself featured is to drown himself or get his neck broken. But, remember—the mere fact that the film maker gets an extra piece of money out of it does not legally bind him to contribute anything toward burial expenses.

"Ingy" Oes is quite a few hairs ahead of Herb Miles in the great Fourteenth Street mustache contest.

While exhibitors in Chicago are getting dimes "giving the people what they want," Lyman Howe is getting dollars giving the people "what the exhibitors don't want."

Joke.—Why is it they are changing all the big theaters into moving picture houses?

Because that is the only reel way to fil-em. (Kindly omit flowers.)

MAJESTIC THEATER, NEWARK, N. J.

The new and well constructed Majestic Theater, located at 534-536 Springfield Avenue, Newark, N. J., is under the proprietorship of the M. & S. Amusement Co., which is composed of two well-known photoplay exhibitors, Messrs. Martin Singer and W. H. Meiser. This elaborate theater recently opened its doors to the public and has since been playing to capacity. The construction of this new fireproof structure amounted to $15,000. It is up-to-date and modern in every respect, having both a ladies' and gentlemen's retiring rooms and a seating capacity of 300. Two Powers No. 6 machines are used. This company also operates two other beautiful and well-paying photoplay theaters here.

Attention, Scenario Writers

So much of our time is consumed in furnishing scenario writers with a list of the manufacturers' addresses that we print herewith the complete list, which we suggest that they cut out and save for future reference. For the information of all, we will also add that we do not buy scenarios, neither do we have time to read or pass criticisms upon them.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

A KNIGHT AND A ROCK-FLINGER.

Editor Moving Picture World,

Dear Sir: In the days that are done, gentlemen were wont to go forth right joyously and splinter their lances in friendly fashion. In these effete times, they put fresh ribbons on their machines and write to the paper. While enjoying such a joust with a sprightly knight of Newark, I am annoyed by a person who, signing himself "Scenario," flings rocks from the bushes. I may remark for "Scenario's" special benefit that the $1,485 mentioned by me was net receipts for scenarios sold during the twelve months ended June 30 last, while the "something over one hundred scenarios" referred to my total sales since I first took up this work, very considerably more than one year ago. I am afraid "Scenario's" little lesson in simple arithmetic is wasted.

It is with pleasure that I turn to face the lance of the gallant Knight of Newark, who "comes back" in a manner to warm the heart. It has been a long while since I enjoyed anything so thoroughly as his letter of the 15th, even though he is unjust enough to accuse me of interjecting personalities into this momentous interchange. But I can readily forgive that, as well as certain little sarcasms, and a few actual errors.

The most egregious of Mr. Kitchell's mistakes is in his suggestion of "pull" in connection with the modest success I have had. So far from using the magnetic personality the possible possession of which he accredits to me, I have never seen but two scenario editors and one director in my life, and while remaining in my memory as most agreeable incidents, those meetings were certainly without result in a financial way. Another mistake is the assumption that "The Road to Richmond," concerning which he has kind words, was the effort which brought my $90 check. In fact, that scenario was one of the poorest sales I ever made; I am quite ready to agree that my best work does not always bring the largest-figured checks. Incidentally, not desiring any undeserved credit, I may remark that the producer got so far away from my scenario that I might not have recognized "The Road to Richmond" when I saw it on the screen had it not been for the title and the one "big" scene. I do not admit, however, as Mr. Kitchell thinks probable, that that photoplay has been my best known effort. "The House With Closed Shutters" (AB) created, I think, a much greater impression, as did the Biograph two-reel, "His Trust" and "His Trust Fulfilled."

Mr. Kitchell refers to the appearance in the "first" number of the Motion Picture Story Magazine of a story based on his play, "Mike the Housemaid." Mike was right there, in the first (February) issue, and in the March reprint, but what is this supposed to prove? In the April number the feature story was my "His Trust" and sequel; in the May number was my Biograph, "Was He a Coward?"; in the July number appeared my Kalem, "Mexican Rose Garden"—so far as that goes. It is just as relevant to remark that I am on the writing staff of that magazine, and that stories by me may be found in the June, July and August numbers.

As to the challenge to match any eight of my released photoplays against those of his authorship mentioned by Mr. Kitchell, I hardly see how a fair decision could be rendered—fair to either Mr. Kitchell or myself, for the simple reason that, as he remarks, I did not make my reputation (I never knew before that I had one) as a comedy writer—my comedies have been comparatively few in number, as against many dramatic efforts—while, if I understand correctly, practically all of Mr. Kitchell's releases have been comedies. Such a challenge as his would, therefore, mean simply lining up the photoplay comedy against the photodrama, which could be done as well in the abstract as with specific examples of each class.

As for press comment, some of my plays have been roasted to a most beautiful brown, without my cheerfulness or my faith in their degree of dramatic merit being in the least disturbed. For example, "Rose o' Salem-Town" (AB) and "The Love of Summer Morn" (Kalem). In fact, I am not sure that I don't enjoy a real vicious roasting more than a paragraph of lukewarm praise—criticism is merely individual opinion, after all, and the play that can jolt a savage attack out of one man may be safely considered as pleasing some other person in exactly the same ratio.

Mr. Kitchell asks how many of my scenarios have been produced exactly as written. Answer, one. Just one, exactly as written, though a number have held pretty closely to manuscript. When I can write them so that they will be put on as written, I will be a very valuable person, and will try to see that my value is fully appreciated.

I entirely disagree with Mr. Kitchell as to the relative popularity of "Westerns" and more serious subjects—good comedies, I grant, are always well received on the rare occasions when the public gets a chance to see them. But, aside from the small boy, the public is sick of cowboys with whiskered pants, and three out of five observant house managers will bear this out. But the houses have to take them whether they like them or not; the European market gobbles them; they are dead easy to make at the smallest expense, and "scenarios" can be fixed up by the office boy or bought at a dollar and a half a bushel. Therefore they are made. More of the "highbrowed" complacent confidence. That "highbrow" charge would seem really funny to Mr. Kitchell if he did know me from our honored first president—for I belong in the backwoods from whence he has seen those specimens of scenario impossibilities emerge, and only once in a while—a very long while—grease my boots and wander down ter the city. I'll have to walk a mile to mail this, count o' the horse bein' lame.

To conclude. The selling of scenarios is a plain, business proposition. The competition between the producing companies is sufficiently keen to insure an offer for a script of what the script is worth to the company making the offer. The scenario-writing field is greatly overcrowded. If you don't like the market, don't bring goods. Whether scenario writing does or does not pay depends on the scenarios. I wish Mr. Kitchell the very best of luck, and trust he has enjoyed our little joust as much as I have.

EMMETT CAMPBELL HALL.

THE TRIALS OF A SCENARIO WRITER.

Just one year ago I was seized with the desire to write a scenario for a motion picture. This attack was not sudden. I felt it coming on the first time I saw a motion picture, when they were not as popular as they are now, and when one went to see them on the sly.

I wrote a scenario, and sent it out. It was returned. Sent out another one, and that, also, was returned. I sent out another one, resolving that if this came back, I should bury my ambitions, and keep on working at the old business of running a home. Joy of joys! A letter came from a firm—Would I accept $10 for the story? Would I? Well I guess! This was making money too easy. My conscience troubled me. It took me just half a day to write this scenario, which was founded on one of Longfellow's poems.

Encouraged by my wonderful success, I wrote another scenario, founded on a newspaper yarn I had read 20 years ago. Two days after sending it out, I received a check for $10. Wouldn't that make you blink? It took me three hours to write that scenario. I had visions of myself reeling off scenarios; checks piling up; castles by the sea; automobiles; motor boats; trips abroad, etc. Alas! They were only dreams—but I am getting ahead of my story.

I went to work in earnest, reeled off scenarios and sent them broadcast. The flattering letters I received from the editors were enough to turn the head of any one. One wrote me that my work was 75 per cent. better than the average, and that if I would follow the enclosed model when writing scenarios, I surely would make a success of the business. I studied the model. Sent out another story. It was accepted. I received $15 for it. I began to feel my importance, criticised the pictures, and felt that I had arrived. At that time I received a letter from another editor, who said if I would follow his suggestions, and read the trade journals, I was bound to be successful.

I sent out scenarios right and left. My first ones must have been amusing reading for the editors—that is if they read them. Some of them would have taken three or four reels to illustrate.

Pathe Freres brought out my first picture, the second one I had sold. With my admiring family I went to see it. How my heart fluttered when the title was thrown upon the screen. How I wanted to shout out that that was my picture. But when it was finished, I was glad I had restrained myself. I wanted to slink out of the theater. It was a mystery to me how such a reliable firm had accepted such a poor scenario. The picture was not half as funny as I had anticipated it would be. I was told afterward that it was a good picture, but I never could see it.

For my next scenario, I received $20. I had not had one accepted for two months when the check came. I had about decided to quit writing, but this check, the largest I had received, was like a whiff of whiskey to a man swearing off. Back to my desk I went and reeled off several more stories.

About this time I went to Keith's Fourteenth Street Theater to see another of my pictures. The scenario was taken from a standard story, and I had received $15 for it. It was released by one of the best film companies in this country, and I felt right proud of myself. But my pride fell with a thump. It was a beautiful film, and the manager wrote me afterward that they considered this film the greatest achievement in the history of the business. But this was not salve to my wounded feelings, for they had put in scenes that I had left out, and cut out scenes that I had put in, and I wondered why they had taken it. Later I found out—but that will keep.

Another time I went to the same place to see another picture of my own. I had written it for a full reel, the company made a half reel of it. I had thought the story funny when I wrote it, and came prepared to laugh hilariously. I didn't. It was flat—at least I thought it was. As the picture was flashed upon the screen, I heard some one beside me give a hysterical laugh; then came a laugh from the gallery, and finally it seemed to me that every one in the house was laughing, with the exception of myself. I couldn't account for it—the picture was stupid. However, I felt better, the story had got over the screen, and would go.

Another story, the sweetest and best I had written, was cut and changed to suit the whims of an egotistical leading man.

All of my stories thus far had been received well by the trade journals. Then I received a call down. I wrote up a very dramatic scenario from a classic. In order not to offend the public, I changed the working out of the plot somewhat. I sent it to every Licensed firm, and to a number of Independents. Back it came, as regularly as the proverbial cat. I finally decided I would burn the manuscript. Then, in an evil moment, thought I would try it once more. I received a check for $10 for it. I thankfully accepted it, although I was then receiving more for my stories, for I felt that in the case of this scenario "A bird in the hand was worth two in the bush." Had I known it, I could have got my price for it, for the company had the picture ready to release when they sent me the check.

I saw this picture in the factory, and was delighted with it. It was beautiful, artistic, perfect in every detail, and acted splendidly. The manager told me the Board of Censors had praised it highly. But alas and alack! That picture, with perhaps a few exceptions, brought forth more adverse criticisms than any that have been produced thus far. It was also praised sky high as well, but the adverse criticisms more than balanced the praise. The manager of the theater in my own part of the city refused to show it.

In eight months I sold nine scenarios. The last four months I have sold none. But don't imagine I have been idle. I have been giving free suggestions to moving picture film companies—that is to a numher of them.

I sent a scenario to one company. They kept it for weeks. Finally I read in one of the journals that a film from this story would be released on a certain date by the company that had my scenario. That day the manuscript was returned, with the information that the company was going to release the same story on a certain date—one week earlier than the date advertised—and that they had no use for my scenario. I was mad, but I could do nothing, for the scenario was written up from a classic. I wrote to the firm for the name of the author of the scenario. They replied that one of their staff wrote it. I scratched the name of that firm off my book.

In contrast to the action of this firm is that of the company I have mentioned above, who so changed the scenario I could scarcely call it my own. They acknowledged they paid me simply to keep me from sending the scenario elsewhere, for they had planned to use this story for a picture before I sent in my manuscript.

Another company kept a scenario a long time, then returned it with regrets. Shortly after I read the synopsis of a story in one of the magazines, the plot of which was the identical plot of the scenario I had sent to this firm. I wrote them a diplomatic letter, asking the name of the author, and they replied that they regretted to state that they could not give it, as the original manuscript was one of several that they thought was purloined from their files since their production, and that they had every reason to suspect a former employee in their scenario department, who had been quite recently discharged for certain irregularities. They are a reliable firm, so I have accepted their explanation.

These are only two experiences of many. George Rockhill Craw, in the Moving Picture World, suggests a way for scenario writers to protect themselves. It means extra work, which would be all right if every scenario was accepted.

Another thing: editors of scenarios urge authors not to send a copy of the same story out to different firms at the same time. They say it is not treating the companies fair. This is rather hard on the authors sometimes. I sent an apple blossom story to a firm before the trees were in blossom. When it was returned, the trees were bearing fruit, and it was too late to send it elsewhere.

I believe I write better scenarios now than when I first began to write, but they are not snatched as quickly as then. I have not stopped writing. It is impossible for me to do so—there is always the hope of having them accepted.

CENSOR BOARD EXPLAINS ABOUT "THE NUN."

Editor Moving Picture World,

Dear Sir: Recently there has been a number of criticisms in the newspapers upon the film entitled "The Nun." Some of the published statements have been that this picture was not passed by this Board. As the picture was passed by this body, it is only due to the manufacturer that we make this statement.

In passing this picture the Board looked upon it as merely a dramatic production. Such questions as to whether the picture is untrue or unrepresentative of certain phases of life, does not come within the scope of our censorship. A very sordid interpretation could have been taken of the actions of the priest or a perfectly unobjectionable view, aside from the fact that he was breaking his vows, could also be taken. There are certain questions of good taste and consideration of the general public which are outside the scope of any general censorship. These questions are entirely up to those who are directly interested in the amusement.

In connction with the various newspaper statements upon this incident we wish to correct an apparent inaccuracy in an interview with one of the members of the Board given in a New York paper. It stated that only certain companies were co-operating with this Board. Since last fall every manufacturer and importer of motion pictures in the country have been submitting their pictures to this Board and have consistently lived up to their agreements that any eliminations asked for by us would be so made.

Very truly yours,

THE NATIONAL BOARD OF CENSORSHIP.

Walter Storey, Gen. Sec'y.

[We give space to the above because it places the Board of Censorship. While "The Nun" has been severely criticized for its ruthlessness, we might almost say, sacreligious, handling of Catholic traditions, there is nothing immoral in the picture and that is as far as the censoring power of this board extends.]

FROM A LITTLE GIRL.

New York, July 11, 1911.

Dear Editor: I read the stories of the films in the Moving Picture World. I am very much interested in moving pictures and think they are better every time I go to see them. My chum and I often go.

They have taught me a great deal, especially the historic pictures, as they help me to memorize my history lessons in school to quite an extent. I am fond of the French pictures, too. They are as real as they can be. I see by the pictures their dress and customs are indeed different from ours.

My chum is very much taken with the comic pictures. She thinks the Mutt and Jeff pictures are fine. I do, too. They are good in the funny sheet, but do such comical stunts in the moving picture, you can laugh much more.

Scenic pictures are very beautiful, showing lakes, waterfalls and mountains, etc. We see many places we may never be able to go to. In one picture, I remember, the Canals of Venice, with boats sailing through them, and though hearing a great deal about them, I learned much more by seeing the picture itself. The boats looked very pretty and odd. So real was the picture one could imagine themselves there.

Dramatic pictures are very good. They are often taken from life. A number of them are very sad, but together with the comic ones we see a fine show.

I enjoyed a picture which I remember having seen one night, showing us "How Edam Cheese Is Made." I always ICE-COOLED THEATERS.

Emporia, Kan., July 14, 1911.

Editor The Moving Picture World,

Dear Sir.—I have read the article in your paper in regard to cooling theaters with ice. I use ice and make a success of it. My house seats 300 people. It is equipped with a twenty-six inch exhaust fan at the rear. I built an ice box outside the building, directly under the outlet of the fan and connected it with an air tight galvanized iron pipe to the opening of the fan. The bottom of the box is built of 2 x 6s put in on edge two inches apart. The fan is reversed and draws the air into the house. The box is large enough to take three three-hundred-pound blocks of ice placed on end with two-inch space between. The air is drawn up through the 2 x 6-inch slats, through the ice and discharged into the room. The temperature is reduced at least 25 degrees.

Of course it is understood that the number of people in the house will govern the temperature to a great extent. Three hundred people in a closed room without some cooling device would make the place feel like a furnace. I have had three hundred and twenty-five people in my house at one time and the place was not uncomfortably warm. I use ceiling and wall fans to stir the air in the room. Ordinary fans do not cool. It is impossible for a fan to cool air. It stirs it; nothing more.

Now as to the cost. Nine hundred pounds of ice costs me $1.80, and manager can get wholesale prices on ice. I use about six or seven hundred pounds of it between seven and eleven p. m. The balance goes to waste. Eighteen admissions pays for the ice and if I did not use it, I would have to close, I could not pay expenses. My attendance has increased one hundred per cent. since I began to use it.

I forgot to state that I keep the doors closed and open the ventilators over the entrance and exit doors. This lets out the warm air and has a tendency to hold the cool air in the room.

If this is of any benefit to my brother managers, they are welcome to it.

Very truly yours,

P. J. CONCANNON, Manager.

two-story store room facing west 90 feet by 25 feet wide, 4 feet elevated floor, sloping down 40 feet, which on account of the extreme steep floor was very difficult to ventilate. I had a machinist build me an old-fashioned water wheel 6 feet high, 30 inches wide, with 6 paddles on same, each paddle measures 30 inches long, 24 inches wide, which makes 720 cubic inches of air each blade carries. I then built a casing of wood sides and tin around between sides, around fan and put a 12-inch pulley on shaft; cost of making same, $27.50. I bought a second-hand 3-horsepower engine for $30 and set same back 12 feet from fan. The outlet of casing from fan is 18 inches in diameter, which is divided in center at opening to two 9-inch tubes made of tin running one foot above where the average person sits along both sides of the walls. Every 3 feet are 6-inch openings, the ends of 9-inch tube being closed in order to force air out of openings along on the side tubes, this fan has 6 paddles carrying each 720 cubic inches of air, which equals 4,320 inches and runs 200 revolutions per minute, which makes 864,000 cubic feet of fresh air that I put in my house per minute. This fan sits outdoors opposite one of the windows and tube comes in at the top of same: I also have two 18-inch suction fans, one on each side of house in front, to take out hot air as the cold air coming in forces the hot air to walls, therefore has to have an outlet; it is one of the biggest advertising stunts I ever pulled off, as everybody comes to the picture show to get cooled off. When I first installed the fan I gave a free show. I seat 400 and I had easy 500 in house at one time and to say the least, it was one of the hottest nights in June; many brought fans, but we never saw any of them moving. The engine uses one gallon of gasoline a night, which costs 16 cents, so I consider it is cheaper than electricity.

I will be glad to send anybody photo and drawing of same for cost of same, 25 cents. I am always glad to read the many advanced ideas of the pictures, but am sorry to say that I can not get pictures that we most desire. I have tried all of the exchanges within 300 miles of me, but can not get them to give a mixed program. We have three classes to cater to: first the cowboy spirited ones; the "will-be-married-some-day" class, and the old, old ones, like all the rest, that good old comic. But, alas, we get all cowboy or all love stories or all comic. Why? Because the exchange has not got the time to fool with us "little folks," as they call us in small country towns, although the advance agent will give all kinds of promises, but the house never knows anything about them.

Hoping you success and ever waiting the arrival of the next issue of the World, I beg to remain,

R. G. SYKES.

Altoona, Pa.—A new moving picture theater is being erected at Sixth Avenue and Fourth Street by Mr. Joe W. Feese. Mr. Feese, who has had considerable experience in the business, intends to make it one of the most up-to-date moving picture theaters in the city. The building will be of solid brick, seventy-two feet long and thirty-three feet wide. It will have a tiled lobby, and a very attractive front. The seating capacity will be about 400—300 on the main floor and 100 in the balcony. Nothing but moving pictures will be run. Admission price five cents.

CORRESPONDENCE

CLEVELAND.

The Quadrennial World Carnival of the Macabees brought in the neighborhood of 20,000 visitors to this vicinity during the week of July 16, and brought a welcome increase in receipts to the coffers of the photoplay theaters. After the parade on Thursday night, downtown houses did the record business of the summer.

Mayor Baehr, the Forest City, is a moving picture fan of the most pronounced type. Upon being asked to give a verbal expression of his regard for the photoplay, the executive said: "My feeling towards the moving picture is best expressed by the fact that I never miss the opportunity of visiting a picture house whenever I possibly spare the time. I like them; I think they are great. Nothing else I know of can combine the entertainment features with the educational value found in so many pictures. I saw an Indian picture the other night at the Alhambra, showing a young brave gambling, with his bride as the stake, which was very interesting, and at the same time gave a most graphic presentation of Indian customs. Believing in the motion picture as an educator of exceptional possibilities, as I do, I have had arrangements made to give free exhibitions of selected subjects in the city playgrounds. The success of this venture has exceeded my fondest expectations. We are handicapped in this enterprise by the lack of any stipulated appropriation with which to meet the expense, and we also have only one machine. I do not think this policy will in any way be competition with the regular exhibitors; on the contrary, it will interest people in the pictures, who have never been patrons of the shows, and in this way be a fine advertisement for them and a creator of new business. Yes, I like Western pictures when there is nothing repulsive or obscene in them, and of course, when they are not ultra-melodramic. Good cowboy pictures come as a welcome relief in programs otherwise too heavy. But historical subjects and industrials, I think, should be more numerous. I thank you, and be sure to come again."

Mr. Lewis, proprietor of the Corona and Orpheum, intends soon to remodel the former house, putting in about 75 more chairs. He recently gave as a special attraction at the Orpheum, an illustrated song by a very capable soprano. So satisfactory were the financial returns, that he is considering adding a song as a regular feature, and also making different arrangements for musical accompaniment of the picture. Automatic music does not seem to fill the needs at that house, though business is showing rapid gains.

Summer seems to be over so far as the business done at the Alhambra is concerned. Full houses are the rule these nights, long before the first show is finished, with too few seats to accommodate the crowds until the second show of the evening is well begun. The opening of the Elysium, two blocks above, although it does an immense business, has failed to affect the Alhambra attendance in the least. Good pictures, well projected, accompanied by good music well chosen to fit the picture, is the answer.

Thanks to the appearance simultaneously of Jesse James on the screens of some picture shows, and a desire for finery in the heart of Edna Peebles, a little eight-year-old girl of Akron, certain papers have recently had another excuse to attack the photoplay—and it must be admitted, so far as the pictures mentioned are concerned, with just cause. Miss Peebles secured a revolver which she could neither load nor snap, a red handkerchief, with which she covered her face, and visited a Cuyahoga Falls Bank. There being only one clerk in the bank at the time, she proceeded to hold him up in true Jesse James style. Of course, to her surprise, it didn't work. She was arrested and coaxed to say that the moving pictures of Jease James she had seen were responsible for her attempt. Certain dailies thereupon proceeded to lambast all moving pictures instead of the leather headed exhibitors who went back six years to "get the money" with one of the worst films ever made. The child was not prosecuted, but given a chance to secure an education in more favorable environments. Her father in a saloon, her mother an invalid, what more could have been expected? But no denunciation of the exchange which supplies, or the manager who exhibits such a picture as "Jesse James," can possibly be too severe. Mold the future of the photoplay with the wholesome clay of the present, rather than with the filthy mire of days fortunately gone by.

Final preparations for the big convention to be held here have been made, and a large and representative attendance is assured. The Reception Committee is made up of the following gentlemen: M. A. Lewis, chairman; Foster Simmons, Samuel Bullock, Max Schachtel, B. Steele, C. F. Schroeder, L. W. Faucett.

B. G. DRUMMOND.

LOUISVILLE.

The moving picture world of Louisville, continues to pursue the even midsummer tenor of its way without appreciable interference from unfavorable factors. Business is uniformly good, both with downtown and suburban houses and no cloud of ill omen is visible to mar the commercial sky. Luckily for the film fraternity, a period of delightfully cool weather is now ruling, so that the general public seems in the exact mood for pleasure-going and every house in the city is making money.

The Broadway Amusement Company has been operating a chain of high-class attractions at its various houses during the past week and House Manager Rausch, of the Broadway, says that things are going fine. The English Opera Company, playing a high-class operatic sketch, has been a tremendous drawing card at the Broadway during the week and is now playing a similar engagement at the Baxter. The Baxter Airdome ran a "Baxter Minstrels" bill as its theatrical attraction last week, and delivered the goods with a vengeance. The minstrels are composed of some of the best amateurs in Louisville, headed by Miss Elsie Abell. It is noticeable that the Broadway company makes it a policy to sign up special attractions for a week's run, at least, at each of the pair of theaters and trio of airdomes operated under Broadway management.

Henry Reiss, house manager of the West Broadway Theater, and Fred J. Dolle, treasurer of the same house, both members of the Broadway Amusement Company, went to St. Louis, Mo., last week for a short business trip, investigating picture conditions and opportunities in that city.

The Princess Amusement Company is doing fine business with scarcely room for improvement, said Treasurer Mayer, of Hopkins Theater. The Orpheum, a Princess house, drew crowds last week with "The Profligate," an educational film portraying France during Napoleon's time, while "Dad's Boy" also made good. Both of these are Pathe productions. The Casino, another Princess house, featured "The Backwoodsman's Suspicion," and scored a success with "Jinks Joins the Temperance Club," one of the best humorous films shown locally in some time.

A. S. Mayer, treasurer of Hopkins' Theater, and one of the best-known moving picture showmen in Louisville, enjoyed a fortnight's vacation trip to Hardin Springs, Ky., and returned a few days ago to tell his adventures to the representative of The Moving Picture World. The residents of Hardin Springs believe firmly in the genial Hopkins' treasurer as an able exponent of Terrible Teddy's strenuous doctrine, for he won a 1-mile skiff race handily at the Springs and captured another trophy by being the premier rifleman, shooting 98 out of a possible 125.

Manager Charles Shaw, of the Avenue Theater, says that his second week's run as a straight moving picture man in local amusement circles, bids fair to surpass the first, and that is "going some." The Avenue's bill this week is bringing lots of business, showing a dramatic subject, "Thou Shalt Not Lie," mixed with comedy in "A Cowboy and a Lord," and "A Bad Half Dollar."

The Empire Theater devoted one night last week as a Benefit Night for the Louisville Baseball League, a local semi-pro organization, and to say that the ball fans and fanoritas have been flocking to the East Market Street house ever since is putting it mildly. Little Aileen Ducker, an infant prodigy in local theatrical circles, danced a butterfly terpsichorean endeavor on the benefit night and scored so tremendously that the Empire management was tempted to make her a permanent offer in spite of her four years' youth.

It was announced last week in the City Building inspector's office that a permit had been awarded to E. Greeley for the erection of a $5,000 moving picture theater of the most approved type at Fourth and O Streets, in Louisville. Work upon the structure will be commenced this week and will be rushed to completion. The location is in what is known as "South Louisville," a suburban district far removed from down-town so that the new theater will undoubtedly do a big business.

The Majestic Theater Company, operating the Majestic and Royal Theaters in Louisville, filed amended articles of incorporation last week increasing its capital stock from $15,000 to $30,000. The maximum limit of indebtedness is also placed at $30,000. President L. J. Dittmar, of the Majestic company, says that trade at both houses could not very well be improved upon.

Albert S. White, one of the foremost negroes in the United States and a resident of Louisville, was shot and killed one night last week by Louis A. Evans, another negro, during a quarrel which grew out of a moving picture show in which both were interested. White was the former lessee of the Lyre Theater, a negro showhouse on West Walnut Street, and when the establishment changed hands he attempted to remove a desk and some other property from the building. Evans, the new lessee, became involved in a quarrel with White over the matter and, drawing a revolver, shot him four times, inflicting fatal wounds. White was a delegate to the Republican convention in Chicago when that body nominated President William McKinley and was prominently mentioned by President Taft as the next United States minister to Hayti. He was prominent in works for his race throughout the United States and was a recognized member of the bar in excellent standing. Evans gave himself up to the police, alleging that the shooting was in self defense. In this he is supported by the testimony of witnesses and is awaiting trial.

The Board of Commissioners of Birmingham, Ala., last week decided not to allow the picture shows of that city to operate on Sunday. The show owners had filed a petition asking to be allowed to operate from 2 P. M. to 10 P. M. on those days, but the request was turned down.

G. D. C. J.

ST. LOUIS.

Mr. Elmer H. Condy, manager of The Amherst Airdome, has organized one of the best minstrel troupes that has been seen in St. Louis for many years. He has obtained some of the best burnt cork artists in St. Louis, and in addition to being the manager, he is also a very clever end man. At the opening performance, Monday night, July 17th, fully 4,000 persons greeted the minstrels. Mr. Condy registered a huge hit when he sang that hard luck song entitled, "Constantly," and was forced by the consistent applause to render several additional verses. Mr. Condy's closest rival for honors was Geo. Weller, formerly of Lew Dockstader's minstrels. Mr. Weller made a hit by singing "Sweet Juliet." Mr. Condy has refused several offers with high-class companies, preferring St. Louis to traveling.

The Hopprodrome Theater, being built by Frank L. Talbot, at 6th and Walnut Streets, which will be the largest house of its kind in the West, is reported to open its doors about Oct. 1st. The management announces that the feature of the house will be high class performances.

The St. Charles Theater, located at 6th and St. Charles Streets, will eliminate vaudeville after this week, and will resort to motion pictures exclusively.

The Grand Central Theater, at 6th and Market Streets, has installed a huge pipe organ, which is one of the largest in St. Louis.

The Lyric Theater, at 6th and Pine Streets, which is managed by John Cornelius, announces that several feature films have been booked. The Lyric is one of the coolest theaters downtown.

The Gem Theater, at 6th and Walnut Streets, which is managed by Frank L. Talbot, has again signed up the Harmony Singers, conceded to be one of the best quartettes in St. Louis, and which drew large crowds nightly last season.

Messrs. Heib & Kiely, owners of the Empress, Mozart and Russell Airdomes, announce that they have engaged the Western Vaudeville Circuit to book acts for their airdomes.

The Grand-Park Airdome, at Grand and Park Avenues, is entertaining its patrons with high class vaudeville and motion pictures. The Eastern Theatrical Co. is furnishing the Grand-Park with the best acts they have in stock. Olsen's Orchestra has been signed for the season.

Arthur Deming, showing with the "Browning All-Star Minstrel Maids," is registering a big hit all over St. Louis. During the past week Mr. Deming showed at the Maple Airdome, located at Kings Highway and Maple, and drew large crowds nightly. Mr. Deming is another Geo. Primrose.

Mr. Jno. F. Meth, former manager of the Grand Theater, and also of the White City Park, of Springfield, Ill., has taken over the management of the Bijou Dream Theater, located at 6th and Washington Avenue, St. Louis. Mr. Meth's ambition is to give the patrons of his house a first class show, and is succeeding. Since taking charge of the Bojou Dream, Mr. Meth has obtained high class licensed film service, showing two first-run and two second-run films every day. In addition to moving pictures, Mr. Meth is booking high class vaudeville acts from the Western Vaudeville Association. The Bijou Dream is a centrally located theater, being in the midst of the downtown traffic, and is drawing large crowds daily. It is directly across the street from the Grand-Leader Dry Goods Co., one of the largest stores of its kind, and the Bijou Dream is known as the "shoppers' rest," among the women. Mr. Meth announces that the second floor of the building will be remodeled and converted into a dancing academy. This will be the only dancing academy downtown. It will open about Sept. 1st. The seating capacity of the Bijou Dream is about 350, well ventilated and cool, open from 10 a. m. to 11 p. m., daily.

The Missouri Airdome, at Hamilton and Delmar, is showing high class vandeville and photoplays. The Western Vaudeville Circuit is booking the Missouri Airdome. Several novelty acts are booked for the coming week.

Anna Buskley's dogs created a big hit at the Hamilton Airdome this past week.

OTTO SCHAEFER.

PITTSBURG, PA.

Mr. F. D. Allison, the manager and proprietor of the Pastime Theater, 441 Market Street, is the first in this city to install a Langslow electric turnstile. This is a unique, money saving device, and should become a permanent fixture of the modern picture theater. The initial device consists of a cash box on the "pay as you enter" plan, which registers every coin deposited, and simultaneously releases the turnstile again, registering the entrant. This not only eliminates the ticket taker, but also saves quite a sum on the tickets, since it also eliminates the tickets. The Pastime Theater has a seating capacity of 200, and is a very neatly modeled photoplay house. It is situated so as to reach from Market Street across to Diamond Street, making it possible to have two exits at the Diamond Street end and an entrance and exit on Market Street. The picture is projected from the Market Street side, the projection battery consisting of one No. 6 Powers and one Edison one-pin machine, and is manned by two operators. The screen is coated with a solution of Mr. Allison's own process. A $3,000 Piano Orchestra furnishes the music. Licensed films are shown.

Dreamland Theater of McKeesport, Pa., exhibited the "Fall of Troy," to capacity business. Mr. J. Berg is the manager.

It isn't very remarkable for a bachelor photoplay house manager to christen his theater with his sweetheart's name, for it may be as an extra inducement for her to become Mrs. Bachelor Manager; but when a married manager christens it after his own wife, then may one truly sit up and take notice, for verily, the name of him shall go down into the pages of history. Mr. Rapp, the manager of the Kathryn, certainly deserves the above. The Kathryn is a neat little house of 250 capacity, and, although having to compete with two older established houses, has been doing surprisingly well since its opening ,eight months ago. Messrs. Rapp & Ruse are the proprietors. Two No. 6 Powers are used for a 90-foot throw, on a 12 x 14 curtain. Mr. Frank R. Guckert is the man in the box, and holds his own with the best. Straight moving pictures from the Independent Film Exchange are used.

The Lyric Theater, in the Grand Opera House Building, on Fifth Avenue, has been the cause of quite a little comment since the installation of Mr. B. F. Rothstein as manager. The Lyric is one of the Harry Davis amusement enterprises. The seating capacity is 270, with standing room for at least 100 more. The lobby is considered one of the finest in the city. Four brass frames, containing posters of the day's run are displayed. The projection may be termed second to none. The operators at this house are well compensated and have shorter hours. The man behind the machine appreciates the better treatment and the result is, that he tries to make good, and does. The floor is very ably managed by neatly uniformed ushers, who are very courteous to patrons. Mr. Rothstein has been in the army, so that a very strict discipline is kept as to things being done as they should be, in the most proper way. First-run licensed films are used.

Shippley & Zip are the progressive proprietors of the Pastime, at 2028 Noble Street, Swissvale. This house seats 300, and has standing room for half as many more. The projection is very good. Both an Edison and a Powers machine are used; the throw is 75 feet from a well ventilated booth. The theater itself is also very well ventilated, having two exhaust fans and six revolving fans. Independent films from the Independent Film Exchange are used. Although having to oppose two other house using independent films, this house has been running to remarkably good capacity.

The Fullmer Theater, Mr. Chas. Fullmer, owner and manager, has been running to capacity business since its opening. The seating capacity is 125. It is well ventilated and is equipped with latest regulation, both using an Edison one-pin machine for projection. Mr. Fullmer is his own operator, stating that no one else is capable of projecting a more satisfactory picture than himself. Mr. Fullmer advertises all independent feature films. The "Fall of Troy" and "Grenadier Roland," were run to crowded houses.

The Fifth Avenue Family Theater, across the street from the Lyric, is the only one-floored theater in the downtown section running vaudeville. The house seats 500, and has standing room for about 150. The lobby is one of the longest in the city. The program consists of eight acts vaudeville from the Morgenstern Booking Agency, and two first-run pictures, admission being 10 and 15 cents. The house is owned by The John P. Harris Co., and is managed by Geo. C. Preston, who had been for six years with Keith & Proctor's 58th Street House, New York City.

The Kursaal Aairdome, at Penn and Franstown Avenues, was opened on July 3rd. The seating capacity is 1,500. Two Edison one-pin machines are used. Independent films, from the Independent Film Exchange, have been used for its opening day. Vaudeville will very probably be added to its program.

Mr Chris. Dimling is building a photoplay house at Forbes and Atwood Streets. The seating capacity will be about 300.

The McKee Theater, at 2334 Arlington Avenue, has been entirely remodeled, extending the seating capacity to 380 seats. A new No. 2 booth is being used, equipped with two Edison one-pin machines. The music is furnished by a $1,200 piano orchestrion. Harry McKee is operating. Mr. Oliver McKee is proprietor and manager. Licensed films are used.

H. E. Kenedy & Co., of Cincinnati, are making plans for a new theater for the John P. Harris Co. The theater will be on Diamond Street, where Goermau's Restaurant used to be. It will be the finest theater in Western Pennsylvania, and will cost $1,250,000. EDDIE WHEELER.

NEW ENGLAND.

The Tremont Theater Co., of which Goeffrey L. Whalen is the general manager, has just come into possession of the Grand Theater, Rutland, Vt. Mr. Whalen stated that the Grand is already exploiting independent films from the William E. Green Film Exchange of Boston, and vaudeville acts secured from the office of Warren Church, of Boston. Six acts of vaudeville and a daily change of reels, make up the programs. Frank L. Browne, formerly of the Pastime, Old South, New Washington, theaters, all of Boston, and more recently in charge of the Casino Theater, Providence, R. I., is at the helm of the Grand Theater. Mr. Whalen, besides overlooking all general details for the Tremont Theater Company, is also resident manager of the Princess Theater, South Framingham, Mass. This house also uses independent pictures and vaudeville. As might be expected, because of Mr. Whalen's varied experience and ability in this line of trade, the Tremont Theater Company is making good.

Hough's Neck, Mass., is one of the Massachusetts summer resorts that offers a fine field for up-to-date motion picture theaters. As a result, the Palm Theater, which is exhibiting motion pictures, illustrated songs and vaudeville, is finding that crowded houses are not by any means difficult to obtain. Licensed reels from the Boston office of the General Film Company, are holding the boards this year. Last year, the Palm Theater was showing the independent product.

The Sea Street Dream, also of Hough's Neck, Mass., is finding business very satisfactory. The Dream is using licensed pictures, and so it is that the independent product is not exhibited at the Neck. Some enterprising manager should get busy and offer Imps, Powers, Nestors, etc., to the people of Hough's Neck.

Messrs. Frankel & Connoley, of the Central Square Theater, Lynn, Mass., are finding business excellent, and are desirous of adding to their moving picture theater possessions. Accordingly, these managers have just taken title to the Broadway Theater, Lawrence, Mass. This house will be open to the public on Labor Day, when five acts of vaudeville and five reels of pictures will be the attractions. The Broadway is a brand new house, well fitted in every way to successfully cope for a generous share of the Lawrence business.

Mr. Sol. Braunig, general manager of the Empire Theater, Providence, R. I., is enjoying a well earned respite by going all the way to Texas for his vacation. Manager Braunig is visiting his folks, and will return to Providence in ample time to open his house on Labor Day.

The Court Square Theater, of Springfield, Mass., will be completely changed as to its appearance when it is again opened to the public. This popular house is undergoing most extensive alterations and general improvements. Manager Gilmore is firm in the belief that his house will be the house of Springfield.

The Velan Theater, New Bedford, Mass., closed for the balance of the summer, and will reopen on Labor Day. Alterations are now in order at the Velan. HENRY.

BOSTON.

Kinemacolor, as presented to the public by means of the pictures showing the Coronation of King George V, received its first introduction to the public of Boston when Mr. F. Eugene Farnsworth, the well-known lecturer, introduced them at the Tremont Temple. The writer can only repeat the statement of the Moving Picture World reviewer, who remarked that they were "moving paintings." The Kinemacolor reels will easily satisfy the most æsthetic. Probably that sums up their beauty, elegance and wealth of coloring as well as can be done, except in an exhaustive article.

It is rumored that plans are being prepared for a theater to be built at 638 Washington Street, for the Pray estate. C. W. Whittier, a prominent realty man, and agent for the estate, admits that there is such a movement on foot. The proposed house will be of fireproof brick and will cost about $100,000. C. H. Blackwell, designer of the Pastime and other Boston picture theaters, will design the new house.

Licensed theater managers visiting the Boston office of the General Film Company, extended a cordial greeting to Joe Cahill, who has returned to his picture and vaudeville theaters after a visit of six weeks in Milwaukee, Wis., where he was visiting relatives. Incidentally Mr. Cahill remarked that some of the Wisconsin theaters "certainly show the pictures." Mr. Cahill will at once resume his work as a proprietor of a score of New England theaters, which will give his partner, John McCue, a chance to take a rest.

The Old South and New Washington theaters have made a change as to the booking of vaudeville acts and are now receiving their acts from Warren Church.

The Beacon Theater, Tremont Street, has also made a change and is now booking from the Marcus Loew agency.

HENRY.

IN THE MISSISSIPPI VALLEY.

The Advance Motion Picture Company, of Chicago, took pictures of the wheat cutting bee, held July 8, on the Whitmore farm, near DeKalb, Ill. Marsh Brothers, inventors of the first American reapers, reside near DeKalb and a contest was promoted, in which all sorts of harvesting devices were used. The film, which was secured under the personal direction of President Eugene Elkins, will be of much educational value. Among the phases of wheat cutting photographed were sickle cutting, cradling, and sharpening the cradle blade; the self-rake, "Uncle Billy" Allen, 93, swinging a cradle, cutting with the pioneer Marsh harvester, threshing with flails and the use of modern reaping devices. An interesting feature is a scene of the most talented wool spinner and carder at work.

Merchants of Camp Point, Ill., combined to give a free moving picture show Saturday nights in the village park as an inducement to people to shop in that town. Not only did the first exhibition attract the rural residents, but three other towns nearby, which have no moving picture shows, turned out liberally.

R. S. Hopper, proprietor of the Lyric Theater, at Freeport, Ill., is said to be contemplating the purchase of a motion picture camera with which he will take local features, such as the fire department, for reproduction in his theater.

Two feature films in Springfield, Ill., within a few days of each other were appreciated by theater-goers. The crowds were helped, without doubt, by modest newspaper advertising. Manager Watts, of the Vaudette, exhibited the Pathe "The Maccabees," July 13, and his house was always full. Manager Loper of the Lyric, had the two Pathe reels of "Faust" July 18 and hacked his crowds out into the lobby and on the sidewalk. This was a pleasing photoplay event. The projection is always good at the Lyric and the pianist equal to the special music. These, with the attractive colored pictures, made an impression upon the audience that will cause kind words for Loper's. More's the pity the musical accompaniment here is not always consistent. From a financial standpoint it is hard to point out the advantages that would result, as the place seems to always do capacity business, but all patrons would be better satisfied.

Picture shows in Canton, Ill., are open again on Sundays.

W. H. Hall has been elected secretary-treasurer of the Wildey Theater, at Edwardsville, Ill.

The Vaudeville Theater Construction Company, of St. Louis, Mo., has increased its capital stock from $50,000 to $100,000.

The Interurban Park Theater, South Vermilion Street, Danville, Ill., of which J. C. Barker is manager, will present moving pictures along with vaudeville. It is built as a pavilion, with curtains and sunshades, which may be drawn; has a drive for automobiles and is surrounded with beds of flowers. One section has been reserved for negroes. The seating capacity is 500, with seats placed far enough apart that persons seated do not have to rise to let in newcomers.

A. W. Ackerman, of Mason City, Ill., has leased the Harris Opera House, at Petersburg, Ill., now controlling three houses, Mason City, Petersburg and Greenview Ill.

Charles Schaffer., manager of the moving picture show at Rochelle Ill., has been seriously ill at his home in Sycamore, Ill.

The Premium Theater Ticket Company, of Chicago, has been incorporated in Illinois with capital stock of $24,000. The incorporators are Fred D. Silberm, James D. Wholey and Martin J. Isaacs.

Charles Yates, of Taylorville, Ill., has purchased the airdome on East Main Cross Street, in that city, from Richard Cleminson.

The Priester's Park Amusement Company, of St. Louis, Mo., has been incorporated with a capital stock of $50,000. The Incorporators are Frank M. Priester, Henry D. M. Doerner, Louis Illmer and others.

The Louisiana Health Train, which makes a feature of moving pictures designed to educate the people in sanitation, gave several exhibitions in the northern part of Illinois.

The Fort Dearborn Amusement Company, of Chicago, has been incorporated with capital stock of $7,500. The incorporators are Julius Johnson, Henry F. Friedman and David Lyons.

Herman Press, of St. Louis, has succeeded Charles Gehring as singer at the Gem Theater in Quincy, Ill.

Charles Robinson has opened an airdome at Carlyle, Ill., featuring pictures. F. H. M.

AMONG THE EXHIBITORS.

Baltimore, Md.—The Picture Garden, the new motion picture house on Lexington Street, between Liberty and Charles, has just been opened. It is equipped with every modern device for the comfort of its patrons, with handsome interior decorations. No one will be allowed to enter the theater until there are available seats. A large waiting room is provided for such patrons. The seating capacity is 400. The entire floor is covered with red velvet carpet and the pictures are of the daylight variety.

Utica, N. Y.—On or about August 1, this city will have a new and thoroughly up-to-date moving picture theater, to be located in Bleecker Street, next door east of the Shubert Theater. Joe Ball, of this city, will manage the house.

Milwaukee, Wis.—The steel work on the new Butterfly Motion Picture Theater, on Grand Avenue, was begun this week, and it is expected that the new show place will be opened early in September. The theater will cost $10,000.

ESSANAY.

COMMY, THE CANVASSER (Aug. 1).—Commy Quickgab, a hustling young salesman, is out of a job, and passing a book store, sees a sign reading, "canvassers wanted." He applies to the proprietor for a job and after producing a recommendation, is given a number of books, for which the proprietor asks five dollars each, with a commission of one dollar to Commy for every book he sells. Commy starts out with a live heart, and presently meets Mr. I. M. Easy, a prosperous looking business man, to whom he sells one of the books. He secures Mr. Easy's card in the bargain, having a scheme in mind. In his office Mr. Easy endeavors to read the book and finds that he has been outrageously stung. Later he goes home, and ignoring his wife's questions, repairs to the bathroom to shave. Commy now calls, Mrs. Easy answers the door, Commy shows her Easy's card, and tells her Easy has ordered one of the books. Without a question Mrs. Easy pays him five dollars for the book, and Commy leaves, delighted at the success of his scheme. Mrs. Easy now takes the book to her husband, who, on finding that he has been swindled, dashes out of the house and sends a passing young man in pursuit of the agent, merely telling him to "Bring that agent back quick!" Catching up with Commy the young fellow explains that Easy wants him, and Commy, with another rapid fire idea, persuades the young man that Easy wants a book and has little difficulty in getting the necessary five dollars from him, telling him to collect from Easy. Returning to where Easy stands with his wife, he hands him the book and explains matters. Easy is thrice stung and is forced to cough up another fiver, whereupon he drops into his wife's arms in a faint.

THE SPENDER FAMILY (Aug. 1).—Mr. Spender is greatly annoyed by his creditors, so decides to take his large family to a summer resort to escape the pests. However, his troubles now begin, for his wife wants new clothes, each of his children want new duds, he ruins his new straw hat under the lawn-mower, the cook tackles him in the kitchen for a new hat and, when Spender heaves a bottle at her head in rage, she mauls him good and kicks him out. The hour for leaving arrives and the whole family gather in the library, clad in their new raiment, only to be met by Spender, who shows them he has spent all his money before they have even started. Therefore Spender is taken in charge for awful punishment by the cook, who proceeds to wreak vengeance on him.

THE NEW MANAGER (Aug. 4).—When young Phillip Carlton is given his father's business upon the latter's death, he looks over his employees and resolves that he needs new brains in the business. Old Samuel Gorman, who has been manager of the concern for years, is told that his services are no longer required, and a younger man is substituted in his place. Gorman is in despair when he learns, through his former employer's attorney that the old gentleman has remembered him in his will and that a $5,000 legacy awaits him. Through careful investments, Gorman soon becomes a wealthy man. His daughter Nellie, who has an exceptionally good voice, is now given the opportunity to visit Europe to continue her musical studies and returns a few years later, a brilliant young vocalist. It is at a fashionable reception that she meets young Gordon, and they both fall in love, but their romance is of a short duration, when old Gorman discovers them at their tete-a-tete and informs the young lady that it was young Carlton who had thrown him out of his position in the Carlton firm. Carlton's business does not flourish under the new manager. A short time after the reception, Carlton finds that he is bankrupt. A sheriff's sale is in progress, when old Gorman enters and offers to buy the business with all its obligations. Carlton is surprised and humiliated, but accepts the offer. However, Gorman, who has really liked the young man, finally forgives him and returns him the business and also the hand of his daughter.

THE TWO GUN MAN (Aug. 5).—Leaving his cabin one morning, Dan Hicks, a squatter, is about to fell a tree, when he discovers an anonymous note pinned on the bark, warning him to move out of the community. Believing it to be the work of a large cattle company, who own a near by ranch, Hicks hurries back to his cabin in a rage, and finds Myrtle Dunn, daughter of the ranch superintendent, who has brought his sick wife some fruit and his baby girl a dolly. Sympathizing with Hicks, Myrtle takes him to her father and gets him to write to President Wilson of the company, asking that Hicks be allowed to remain undisturbed. Wilson, however, desires the squatter removed and hires a noted two-gun man, Jack Harvey, to stay around the ranch, pick a quarrel with Hicks when he sees him and kill him. Harvey arrived at the ranch, goes to Dunn's office and shows him a letter of introduction from Wilson. Dunn is arguing vigorously against the scheme to kill Hicks when Myrtle, who is in the adjoining kitchen, hears the talk and sets out for Hicks' cabin to warn him. Determined to have it out with the "killer," Hicks is on the point of rushing out of the cabin when his sick wife prevails on him to remain with her and Myrtle leaves. Next morning, as Myrtle is picking flowers, Baby Hicks rolls her mother up in a roller-chair and Mrs. Hicks gets Myrtle to beg the gun-man not to harm her husband and to go away. Meeting Harvey, Myrtle gets him to go with her to Hicks' cabin, where, through the open window, the gun-man sees Baby Hicks and her sick mother. Undergoing a change of heart, Harvey now enters the cabin, tells Mrs. Hicks he will leave the community and starts back to the ranch. On the way he meets Hicks, who, knowing nothing of what has taken place, wounds Harvey severely in the arm and leaves him. Hicks now overtakes Myrtle, tells her what he has done and the girl horrifies him with the story of Harvey agreeing to go away. Suddenly Harvey staggers up, Myrtle binds up his arm, Hicks begs forgiveness, the two men shake hands and the picture closes with Myrtle thanking Harvey with a wonderful look from her brown eyes.

PATHE.

MAX'S DIVORCE CASE (July 31).—Max has just been married, but is about to be divorced, because at his marriage party he disgraced himself. Of course, the matter is a secret, but Max was most horribly annoyed with a persistent flea that located itself in his nether garments. So, retiring to a quiet spot, he removed both the garments and the flea, but, unfortunately, he was discovered in his seclusion. In the divorce court Max wins his case, but just how is too good to tell in a story of this sort.

LOVE AND SILENCE (Aug. 2).—A couple of chums are in love with the same girl, and, of course, one is lucky and the other is not so. Sometime after the marriage of the young girl to the fortunate youth, a robbery is committed in the bank where they both work. Though the husband is guilty, suspicion falls upon the friend, and, rather than spoil the happiness of the girl he loves, this friend suffers imprisonment in silence. Five years later the husband dies and leaves a confession of his guilt, and all ends happily with the final reunion of the innocent sufferer and the heart-broken widow.

BLUE WING AND THE VIOLINIST (Aug. 3).—A lone trapper, who finds his only solace in the music of his violin, is captured by the Indians, but, as always, "music charms the savage breast," and finally the musician goes back to civilization with Blue Wing, the belle of the tribe. Civilization, however, does not bring happiness, and shortly Blue Wing is on her way back to the tribe with nothing but a broken heart and a little baby to remind her of her life in the big city.

THE LIAR (Aug. 4).—A young girl and her fiancé, walking through the woods, are pursued by a persistent but unfavored suitor, and when they part, the latter attempts to kidnap the girl, but is prevented from doing so by the fiancé's return. A fight ensues in which the would-be kidnapper is wounded, and the officers of the law arriving, he says that his assailant attacked him from behind in order to steal his purse; in consequence, the poor young man is taken into custody, tried and condemned to death, as was the custom in those days. However, all ultimately turns out well.

LEGEND OF LAKE DESOLATION (Aug. 5).—A little white child, having been raised by Indians, finally returns to civilization, and when she leaves the tribe the water of the river freezes, the sun ceases to shine and the leaves on the trees wither and die, leaving a bare waste, deserted, against a black sky.

THE ROUND-UP AT DAWN (Aug. 9).—The owners of the Double Bar Ranch invite all the boys and girls from the neighboring ranches to the barbecue and dance. During the afternoon, while the party is at its height, Rich Harding, foreman of the Three Star Ranch receives a note from Jim Carey, the owner, advising him that the fence is down in two places and a thousand head of cattle eating Double C pastures baldheaded. Harding is told to come at once and bring everybody but the petticoats. Rich, who is having a fine time in the company of Phyllis, his sweetheart, sends a not back saying he will start for the home ranch shortly after dawn. After the dance the boys retire to the bunk house and the girls to the ranch house for a few winks of sleep. Before sunup the next morning the girls decide to play a joke on the boys. Quietly entering the bunk house, they steal the boys' riding outfits, retire to a safe place, discard their petticoats, and don the boys' chaps. Returning to the bunk house they leave their petticoats and quickly make their escape. Then mounting the cowponies they ride to Three Star Ranch and do the work of the sleeping cowboys. When the sleepers finally awake they find the girls' togery in the place of their own wearing apparel. In the meantime the girls have driven the cattle out of the Double C pastures and ride back to the home ranch. On their arrival they are met by the boys, rigged out in skirts. Being brought to task for the trick they have played upon them the girls laughingly retort, "You are too slow to catch a girl, how could you catch a cow."

THE ROMANCE OF A DIXIE BELLE (Aug. 11).—Shirley and Nell, school chums, vow eternal friendship. The girls graduate and leave for home. Three years later Shirley meets Norman Logan at a Christmas party and falls in love with him at first sight. A few days later Shirley invites Nell to her home for a visit. Soon after her arrival Shirley introduces Nell to Norman, who is greatly impressed. During Nell's visit Shirley sees the mutual attraction between Norman and Nell and learns what it is to be jealous. Shirley by chance overhears Norman avow his love for Nell. Nell immediately leaves for home and shortly afterwards, Shirley learns that Nell and Norman are married. Three years later, on the breaking out of the Civil War, Norman leaves for the front. While on a secret service mission Norman is pursued, and takes refuge in Shirley's home, who, out of consideration for her former love, hides him until danger is past. As he is about to leave the house, however, she demands, at the point of a pistol, that he deliver her the despatches he is carrying. As refusal means death, he is compelled to surrender the despatches, which Shirley quickly destroys. Her love for Norman saves his life, but love for her country's flag proves the stronger.

EDISON.

THE BATTLE OF BUNKER HILL (Aug. 8).—Col. Prescott, one of the heroes of Bunker Hill, is busily engaged drilling his company of Minute Men. Among them is Jack Harrow, who shows such enthusiasm and ability that Prescott singles him out and promotes him to lieutenantcy. Jack is delighted and on the way home tells his sweetheart Jane of his good fortune. He pleads for a promotion in her eyes also and after a few moments' hesitation she consents to become his wife.

The wedding takes place in due time, but scarcely are they pronounced man and wife when Prescott bursts into the room with the news that the men are needed to fight.

Hastily calling his men to arms he is confronted by Jane, who passionately declares that she will not let her husband go to war. Prescott finally persuades her that it is her duty to let him go. After bidding him a tearful farewell she collapses in her mother's arms.

We next see Prescott and Jack under the direction of General Warren, throwing up the earthworks on Bunker Hill, in the middle of the night, while the British across the river are sleeping peacefully.

The morning of the 17th of June, the Britishers moved forward to the attack and charged the hill in marching order. The command went down the American line, "Don't fire until you see the whites of their eyes." They waited and when the volley belched forth the British fled down the hill leaving their dead and wounded on the field. A second time the British regulars fled before the deadly fire of the Americans. A third time they formed, this time with Gen. Howe at their head, and charged the hill. But the Americans had but one volley left, their ammunition was exhausted, and fighting with whatever weapons they could muster, such as spades, picks and even stones, they slowly gave way before the British.

Jack, in capturing a British flag, was severely wounded and taken to a friendly cottage, where Jane soon arrived to nurse him back to health. General Washington arriving to take charge of the American army, and hearing of Jack's bravery, took occasion to thank him in the presence of his staff, to the great gratification of his charming little wife.

THE ADVENTURES OF A BABY (Aug. 9).—Uncle John, a bachelor, who has an antipathy for babies, is thrown into a state of consternation one day when he receives a wire from his niece stating she will arrive on the noon train with the baby for a four weeks' stay, requesting him to meet her at the railway station. She arrives on time, but not seeing uncle, she sits down to await him, when suddenly it occurs to her that she left baby's nursing bottle in the coach. Leaving her baggage and baby in charge of a young man, she hurries back to the train. Just as she regains possession of the bottle the train pulls out, carrying her to the next stop five miles distant, where she hires a country cab to drive her back. Meanwhile the baby is crying lustily in the arms of the young man, who believes a joke has been played on him. After trying various means to rid himself of the baby, he finally slips it into the arms of a prosperous looking old gentleman, who is peacefully dozing in his seat. The old gentleman happens to be Uncle John. When he awakes and finds himself in possession of the baby he nearly goes insane in his efforts to locate the owner. He finally disposes of it by shifting it on to a nurse girl in the street, where a little later on the frantic mother finds it. By this time Uncle John has arrived home and is congratulating himself on getting rid of an undesirable baby so cleverly when the hall boy ushers his niece in, who proudly places her baby into his arms and which to his utter amazement is none other than the one he tried so hard to get rid of.

THE STOLEN DOG (Aug. 9).—A young man, while out for an airing with his valuable dog, meets a young lady and stops for a moment's conversation. While thus engaged a tramp espies the canine, picks him up and disappears into another street, where he sells him to a man for five dollars. Afterward he seeks the owner of the dog and offers to return the animal to him for twenty-five dollars—five dollars on account and the balance of twenty upon delivery.

With ten dollars in his pocket and twenty more in sight, the avaricious tramp succeeds in picking up the dog a second time when the man to whom he sold him isn't looking. He restores the dog to its original owner, who is on the point of paying the extortion, when the second victim, having trailed the tramp, appears upon the scene and claims the dog. Here a wrangle ensues, in which the tramp, subjected to some rough handling, is forced to give back his ill-gotten money and is then kicked out. Having recovered their property, the two men now come to a mutual understanding and indulge in a friendly drink—in which the dog joins!

THE SPIRIT OF THE GORGE (Aug. 11).—Ouchita, the daughter of Chief Massachiquita, is the belle of the tribe. Novashote and Kewanee are suitors for her hand, but she does not know to whom to give it. Word comes that a neighboring tribe has gone on the warpath. Chief Massachiquita calls for volunteers to carry the challenge to the village of their enemies. Kewanee is chosen to carry the challenge, but falls exhausted before reaching his destination. Her father, however, decides to send another messenger and chooses Navashote.

Navashote finds him lying unconscious on the trail, but instead of helping him, only pushes on with his challenge. The searching party, however, finds him and carries him to the village.

Navashote, however, is successful and returns bringing a piece of the enemy's totem pole as a trophy. He is promptly awarded the headdress of a brave. During the festivities, Ouchita dances too near the edge of the chasm and, losing her footing, plunges headlong into the raging waters below. In vain Massachiquita appeals to his men to go to her rescue, but one and all refuse to make the attempt.

They suddenly see a figure making its way down the rocks. It is none other than Kewanee. Jumping into the canoe, he starts after the unfortunate Ouchita, but his canoe is soon upset and crushed against the rocks. He manages to swim to Ouchita, and, keeping her above water, safely reaches the pool, where both are dragged out by the waiting tribe.

For his bravery Kewanee not only wins his feathers, but also Ouchita, who no longer doubts as to where her heart lies.

FRIDAY, THE 13TH (Aug. 12).—Mr. Gayton is given tickets for the theater. He hurries to his suburban home. In his hury to adorn himself in satorial habiliments, he forgets the tickets. He rushes back, and when he boards a trolley car he finds that he has no money, and the fuse of the car blows out. However, a passing friend with an auto accommodates them. The tire is punctured. They arrive at the dock, only to see the ferry sail away.

Mr. Gayton now suggests that they go to an inn for dinner. They arrive only to find that it is in flames. They encounter many more amusing incidents, and before they are finally inside of their house, Gayton finds that he had left the key inside. As he is climbing through the window he is caught by a cop, who is about to arrest him, and is only saved from humiliation by Mrs. Gayton, who explains things.

MELIES.

HIS TERRIBLE LESSON (Aug. 10).—Frank Smith was but a boy, yet withal the sole supporter of a pretty sister, Mary, who kept up their little Western home and made things comfortable for them both. But Frank had fallen into a bad habit—that of drink—not because he liked it, but because he thought it looked manly.

On one occasion he went to the village saloon and engaged in a game of poker with Push Crystal, a heavy drinker. A little quarrel resulted, during which Frank drew his knife. The bartender, however, stayed his hand and pointed out the folly of such rash action. Frank and Push were reconciled and proceeded to drink to each other's health until both became stupified and laid their heads on the table, dead to the world.

Bill Hawkins entered and saw a chance for revenge on his hated enemy, Push. He took Frank's knife from the table, and, when no one looked, plunged it into the breast of Push, after which he fled, stopping only to place the knife in Frank's hand to divert suspicion. When the bartender reentered the room he was horrified. Push lay dead, and a bloody knife was clenched by Frank. With difficulty he awakened the boy, who could not at first realize the situation. Suddenly it dawned upon him that he had, in a drunken stupor, committed murder. In desperation, he knocked the bartender aside and hastened home.

Mary listened to his story and advised him to flee across the border line. Frank mounted and galloped to Old Mexico, where he gained refuge with a Mexican Padre. But soon the longing came to see his home and his sister. Against the advice of the Padre, he took the chance.

Once in Texas, he was soon seen, and a posse was formed to capture him. He evaded it as long as possible by horse and then by foot until suddenly in his flight he fell across the prostrate body of Bill Hawkins. The latter had become conscience-stricken at the grave of Push and fallen over a brink, receiving mortal injuries. When he saw Frank, he was at last inspired with a good impulse, and confessed his crime. The posse arrived at this moment and heard the exoneration of Frank.

Frank returned to Mary a better and stronger boy, for he had experienced a terrible lesson.

Scene from "His Terrible Lesson" (Melies).

VITAGRAPH.

INTREPID DAVY (Aug. 7).—Davy Jones is off again, bound for the East. Seated in a cabin with his messmates, Davy listens to the tales of the "harem" skirts, the Sultan's many charming wives. He listens and smokes the Turkish hooka, and gradually falls into a deep sleep, indulging in a pipe dream of love escapades with the inmates of the harem.

The thoughts of his delightful dreams are constantly in his mind. He flirts with every veiled female he meets, insisting that they withdraw the covering from their beautiful features—to find a lemon where he expected a peach. Finally he gains access to one of the crows, by whom he is surrounded and ardently wooed, from which there seems to be no possibility of escape. To add to his tortures, the mother-in-law of one of the "caricatures" insists upon making "goo goo" eyes at him, and winning his oft-tested affections. He goes from bad to worse by incurring the animosity of the Sultan, when he finds the giddy Davy creating havoc in his family, whereupon a thorough house-cleaning occurs, by every dodgasted better-half being thrown out of the window; which performance divorces the Sultan from all of them without alimony.

Davy doesn't wait to be fired out; he jumps out the window, and as in other exploits of this kind, he manages to get out of harm's way by jumping into a convenient boat, sculling to his ship lying in the harbor. Safely in his cabin with his faithful Poll, he congratulates himself and declares a harem is a delusion and a snare, the charms of its inmates are grossly exaggerated and not in his class.

THE LONG SKIRT (Aug. 8).—May is a tomboy, full of romp and fun; she would rather play than do anything else. The mother writes to her sister and mentions that May does not seem to develop in accordance with her years. May's aunt replies that responsibilities and consideration for others usually come with the clothes that make a child feel that she has outgrown childish things, and in order to bring about this growth of mind, she sends the girl a long skirt, accompanied by a note to her niece, telling her that she must remember she is now past fifteen and she is sure she will wear the dress as becomes a helpful little woman of her years.

May is much delighted with the long skirt when she puts it on, but very much surprised when she goes upon the street and tries to enter into the pastimes of the other children. They treat her as a young lady, look at her as too old to be in their company and refuse to play with her.

Within a few days she is a young lady, taking her place in the household as the big sister and grown-up daughter, assisting her mother.

BILLY, THE KID (Aug. 9).—The duties of the sheriff as performed by "Uncle Billy" were not a matter of pleasure. His son-in-law is a member of the posse; he and "Uncle Billy" leave the house hurriedly to join their comrades in pursuit of the outlaws.

Two hours later the son-in-law is carried back to his home, the victim of the gang. A little daughter is born to the widow and left an orphan. "Uncle Billy" is anxious that the child should be a boy, but through the secrecy of the Spanish servant, "Uncle Billy" never knew that "Billy, the Kid," was a girl.

The sheriff brought her up as a young cowboy, although he noticed there was a certain timidity in the "Kid" that was not at all becoming a boy. When "Billy, the Kid," is sixteen years of age, her grandfather sends her to a town school. Lee Curtis, the forman of "Uncle Billy's" ranch, was the "Kid's" pal; they were very fond of each other, and it was hard for Lee to part with his young associate, when he accompanied her to the cross roads where they meet the stage.

The stage is held up by the outlaws. The "Kid" is taken captive and held as a ransom; they send a note to "Uncle Billy" saying: "If he will grant them immunity, they will restore the 'Kid.'"

When the sheriff gets this message, he is furious, and the Spanish servant who well knows that the "Kid" is a girl, is almost frantic with apprehension lest the "Kid's" captors discover this fact. She tells "Uncle Billy" why she has kept him in ignorance of the truth. Lee Curtis overhears the servant's statement, and with the sheriff, rushes out to get the posse in action.

"Billy the Kid" has managed to escape from the outlaws and meets the sheriff and his posse. Her grandfather loses no time in getting her back home and into female attire. This time "Uncle Billy" is going to send the "Kid" to a female seminary and he is going to take her there himself. She tells her grandfather she just wants to be "Billy the Kid" and have Lee for her life companion. "Uncle Billy" has nothing more to say, and it is not long before she changes her name to Mrs. Lee Curtis.

THE BELL OF JUSTICE (Aug. 11).—In Russia, the Fifteenth Century, the Czar commands a great bell be hung in the market place that all who have suffered wrongs might make them known by ringing it, thus calling the people together and demanding restitution from those who have been guilty of doing them injustice. The Czar himself to mete out the punishment to the offenders.

The first person to ring the bell is an old woman, who has been swindled out of her savings by a villain. People gather at the sound of the bell, and the evil doer is made to give up her money.

Sieur de Magnore, a man of wealth, starts out with his bride on their honeymoon. It is a typical winter's day in Russia. Proceeding on their way over the lonely snow-clad country, they are attacked by a pack of wolves. Sieur whips up his good horse, "Sultan," thereby escaping. As years go by, Sieur grows old and stingy, and neglects his good horse "Sultan." He turns him out. In his wanderings he nibbles at the end of the rope which rings the bell. People gather, in which Sieur is one. The Czar makes Sieur give the faithful equine ease, and plenty of food for the rest of his days.

BIRDS OF A FEATHER (Aug. 12).—Experience has taught many a man that it is always safe and sane to let his wife make her own purchases. Mr. Sutherland did not know this, so he thought he would surprise his wife by sending home a very becoming hat and dress, which he thought would suit her style.

Mrs. Sutherland was very much disappointed and displeased with her husband's choice, and she immediately calls up a dealer in misfit gowns, disposes of her husband's selection and says she will spend the money for clothing more suited to her liking.

Agnes Bonner, a young stenographer, whose means are rather limited, has received an invitation from her beau to go out to dinner. She is sadly in need of a suitable dress for the occasion, and, after looking over her finances, decides to call on Miss Helen, the dealer in misfit garments to see if she can secure something that will make her presentable in Dick's company. She picks out the very dress and hat which Mrs. Sutherland has sold, meets Dick, and arm in arm they walk proudly down the street.

Mr. Sutherland comes along and recognizes the clothing he bought for his wife, and immediately comes to the conclusion that it is she in company with a strange man. He secures a revolver and follows them surreptitiously from place to place till he sees them go to a swell restaurant where they seat themselves at a table and order an extravagant dinner. His anger and jealousy are aroused beyond all endurance. He rushes headlong into the dining room, waving his revolver, demanding an explanation. When Agnes turns around and confronts him, he is so astounded at his horrible mistake and so paralyzed with chagrin he cannot explain himself; he is summarily kicked from the premises, a sadder and a wiser man

A FAIR EXCHANGE (Aug. 7).—Madge Norgan is engaged to be married to George, the only son of Judge Ray, of New Mexico. Carita is the sweetheart of Pedro Sanchez, the leader of a band of horse-thieves. Juan, the brother of Pedro, is captured in the act of driving off a herd of horses and he is imprisoned. George and Madge ride out on horse-back and are picnicking in the woods. George goes to a spring for water and he is captured by Pedro Sanchez and his gang, who are accompanied by Carita.

Madge, alarmed by George's absence, mounts her horse, and unobserved sees and follows her lover and his captors. Carita drops her hat and goes back for it. Madge decides to capture the Mexican girl and hold her hostage until George is freed by Sanchez. The rides that follow in which the American girl chases the Mexican girl, and the neck and neck dash ending in the capture of the Mexican, are real thrillers from start to finish.

Sanchez compels George to write to his father that he will be released when the Judge orders the release of Pedro. Madge receives the note, and sends it back to Sanchez with this written on it: "You have my lover. I have your sweetheart. Return him safely and you can have her. Madge Morgan." Of course George comes back to his spunky sweetheart, and the Mexican girl is returned to her lover.

SLICK'S ROMANCE (Aug. 8).—"Slick" Barlow, "Bunco" Peters and "Yuha" Frank, cowboys of the "Lazy X" outfit, are sent to the city with a bunch of cattle. Hoover, owner of the "Lazy X," meets them in the city, and they dispose of the stock. Hoover then goes to his hotel, while the boys repair to a nearby restaurant.

During the meal "Slick" notices that their waitress is being pestered by a couple of young city mashers. He promptly knocks the fellow down. The other rowdy calls the police and the boys are arrested.

Hoover is called in and he secures their release. "Slick" and his pals then return to the restaurant, only to find that Tillie has been discharged. "Slick" is very much incensed over this and starts out to find Tillie.

After some trouble the boys locate the home of the unfortunate girl. Bunco and Yuha desert their bashful friend, leaving him alone with Tillie.

He visits the Weston home and finds a deplorable condition of affairs. Tillie's father is a good for nothing drunkard, and her mother is rapidly dying with consumption.

Slick then goes to Hoover and persuades the kind-hearted ranchman to take Tillie and her invalid mother back to the "Lazy X," which is located in Arizona.

Arriving at the ranch, the girl and her mother are introduced to Poker Ed, the boss of a neighboring outfit, "The Circle B." He snubs Slick, but pays a great deal of attention to Tillie. This arouses the jealousy of bashful Slick.

Later, the girl refuses Poker Ed, and boldly proposes to her rescuer, Slick. He is taken off his feet for the moment, but quickly realizing the import of her words, he grabs her in his arms, and then rushes off to tell his pals the good news. Poker has seen this action, and swears vengeance on Slick. A few days later, Slick and Tillie are spooning on the parlor sofa. Poker, still surly and frenzied by liquor, sees them through the window and fires at his rival. The bullet hits Tillie and Slick dashes out of the house in pursuit of the fleeing Poker. In the chase Poker is wounded and later is overtaken by Slick and his companions, who lead him back to the scene of his crime, where he is handed over to the proper authorities. Tillie's wound proves to be nothing serious, and so the romance of "Slick" Barlow ends happily.

THEIR ONLY SON (Aug. 10).—Guy Medford, a chap of the moneyed class, arrives home at 3 o'clock in the morning. At the breakfast table the next day, he is reprimanded and leaves for the office in anger.

A client of Mr. Medford, who is a broker, leaves some bonds and a few thousands of dollars in his hands. He instructs Guy to put them away. Before he does so, Mr. Medford accidentally pushed them into a waste paper basket. That evening Guy does the same thing, and instead of going to the office the next day, writes his father a note, saying that he is leaving for Chicago, as he cannot stand his tyranny.

Guy is arrested just as he is about to board the train, as his father, discovering his loss, lays the blame upon his son. However, the son is freed, but is forbidden to come home.

In the meantime, the money and bonds find their way into the hands of a rag-picker, who returns them to the broker. He is given a liberal reward. Mr. Medford and his wife are apprised of the fact that their son has embarked on a liner. They start in pursuit of him and discover him washing the dishes, and is taken into the family again.

A TRUE-HEARTED MINER (Aug. 1).—Two miners are warm pals. One falls in love with a girl and marries her. She loves the other man, and tries to flirt with him. Overseen by the husband, the pal commits an act of tremendous self-sacrifice; catching the woman in his arms he whispers in her ear that her husband is watching, and pressing his gun to his breast severely wounds himself. He forces the weapon into the woman's hand, and it appears that she shot him repulsing his advances. She deserts her husband, telling him the truth, and a pathetic scene takes place at the wounded man's bedside as the two pals clasp hands again.

CATTLE, GOLD AND OIL (Aug. 7).—Will Harrington and his wife are making money on their ranch, but when they read of the possibilities of great wealth in gold at Twin Buttes, they determine to go and buy. As is usual the grafter is around, and they fall victim to his wiles. The gold claim that they have bought is a salted one, and when Will breaks a piece of the precious-looking mineral off, he is astonished to find that it is only plain rock.

Mrs. Harrington is a resourceful woman, and suggests the idea of salting the claim themselves, and make the grafter buy it back. They immediately proceed to do this, and pour barrels of crude petroleum over the claim and in the low places.

The grafter is apprised of the fact that there is oil on the salted claim that he sold, and hurriedly buys it back. After an inspection he soon finds out that it is a faked claim. Will Harrington and his wife return to their ranch with an increased bank role.

THE RANCH GIRL (Aug. 10).—Jack, the foreman of Bar Z Ranch, meets Alice, the new owner of the ranch, and she is welcomed by the boys. Alice and Jack have a growing regard for each other when the clash comes.

Jack refuses the boys a leave of absence when they ask it, on account of pressing work. Mike, a tough character, and one of the boys, leads the others to ask for the holiday from Alice. She grants it and the boys ride away in open derision of Jack. Jack complains to Alice that she should not have interfered, as it is a poor showing of discipline, and she coldly informs him that it is her ranch and she will run it to suit herself.

Under these conditions Jack sees nothing left for him to do but leave her employ, which he does. He seeks work on a nighboring ranch and Alice selects Mike for her new foreman. His first official act is to discharge all the cowboys who are friendly toward Jack and replaces them with cronies of his own. The discharged boys find work under Jack and inform him how matters stand at the Bar Z. Jack rides over to expostulate with Alice, but she informs him that she is capable of taking care of herself and her own affairs, and shows him her gun. Jack, as a warning to the toughs, arranges a shooting exhibition when they will he able to see how well Alice can handle a gun. Alice shows remarkable skill but, when she becomes aware of Jack's purpose, she resents it and returns to the house. Mike threatens to do Jack up for his interference, but Jack calls his bluff.

Some days later Alice goes to town and, during her absence, Mike and his cronies plan to loot the house and leaves with the booty. Jack rides over and while Mike engages him in conversation, one of the plotters fells him with a blow, leaving him unconscious. They tie his hands and feet and hurry to the house, where they take everything of any value and make their escape from the ranch. When Jack recovers consciousness he tries in vain to free himself, but the desperadoes have done their work well. His horse is wandering about the ranch yard and he calls to her. The intelligent animal comes over to him and, taking the rope that ties his hands, in her teeth, soon releases him. Jack hastily tears a leaf from his notebook and writes: "Boys, I am on the Alpine Trail. Come quickly and well armed. Jack." Fastening the note to the saddle-pocket, where it will he seen, he sends the horse to the ranch and starts in pursuit of the desperadoes. The horse goes directly to the ranch where Jack is employed and, when the boys find the note, they mount and hurry to Jack's assistance, taking his horse along. When they arrive on the Trail, Jack has already located the gang and, after a sharp conflict, they are captured and Alice's valuables recovered.

Alice, returning to her ranch, finds everything in disorder and the culprits gone. Woman-like, she sits down and cries. Jack comes to restore her property and finds her thus. Although Alice has been headstrong she knows also when she has had enough and she is very glad to have Jack assume charge again, this time not only of the ranch, but of herself as well.

THE POISONED FLUME (Aug. 14).—After the death of her husband, Mrs. Kendall found the management of the ranch, with its attendant responsibilities, a source of worry. Her daughter, recently returned from an Eastern boarding school, could not assist her and, although the cowboys in her employ were faithful, the ranch needed an executive head.

John Morgan, a neighboring ranch man, had long cast envious eyes upon the widow's increasing herd of cattle, and desired to marry the daughter in order to obtain possession of her ranch. He offers to manage her affairs for her, but the widow distrusts him and refuses his offer.

Mrs. Kendall finally secures the services of Jim Stevenson, a manly young cowboy, and he is introduced to the boys as the new manager. They take him out on the range that he may become better acquainted with his new duties. They encounter John Morgan, who is ordered off the range by the new manager.

Morgan determines to force his attention on Hazel Kendall and hurries to the ranch house. He finds Hazel alone and attempts to kiss her when Jim, coming to the house to report, witnesses the struggle and rescues her from the distasteful caress. Mrs. Kendall orders Morgan to leave her premises and he goes away with hatred seething in his heart.

He returns to his ranch and plans a most diabolical revenge. Mrs. Kendall's cattle obtain their water from the flume which runs through her ranch. Morgan poisons the water just above where it enters her range and thus attempts to destroy her entire herd. The cattle come to drink the poisoned water and return to the range to die. Jim discovers some of the dead cattle and, thinking an epidemic has broken out in the herd, sends one of the boys for a veterinarian. On his arrival he discovers the poison and, suspecting the water in the flume to be the cause of the trouble, he makes a test and finds his suspicions confirmed. Jim wonders who could have conceived such a dastardly plot and hurries up the flume to look for the poison. He finds the sack floating in the water and has just removed it when Morgan rides up and fires, wounding Jim in the shoulder.

The shot startles the boys grouped around the veterinarian and they hurry up to find their managaer severely wounded and a fleeing horseman just disappearing over the brow of the hill. The veterinarian picks up the sack of poison and shows it to the boys. They start in pursuit of the fiend, leaving one of the boys to convey Jim to the rauch house. They soon come within sight of Morgan, and the man-hunt is on. Relentlessly they close off all means of escape and, making a wide detour, the desperate man returns to the flume and, dismounting from his horse, he climbs to the waterway and attempts to escape along the high trestle, firing at the cowboys as he runs. He is finally struck by a bullet and, with a shriek of terror, he falls into the poisoned water, the last victim of his own diabolical plot. Jim, at the ranch house, through the careful nursing of Hazel Kendall, is soon convalescent, and it is evident that the culmination will be a happy one.

THE OLD PEDDLER (Aug. 7).—Little Willie buys a pair of suspenders from a pack peddler and the vendor is struck by the resemblance of the boy to his dead child, and asks the boy to call on him. Willie does so and on his way home two thugs plan to kidnap the boy. He is accompanied by his two dogs, which play important parts in the story. The peddler, fearing for the safety of the child, follows him and frustrates the plans of the villains. He covers the boy with boughs, being assisted by the dogs, and throws the men off the scent. The dogs return home and alarm the parents and the police, who go in search of the boy. The thugs try to throw suspicion on the old peddler, but he brings the boy safely to his home in his pack and earns the gratitude of the family.

DOROTHY'S FAMILY (Aug. 10).—Dorothy is a level-headed young woman, practical in love affairs as well as everything else. She has two admirers, both bent on marrying her, but she is unable to choose between them, as they are both handsome, debonair, rich and in every way eligible. They pay assiduous court to her and it resolves itself into a choice. Dorothy is in a quandary as to which is the more worthy, but finally hits upon a scheme to test them out. She invites in the dirty, ill-clad children of the neighborhood and introduces them to the first caller. He gives one look and beats a hasty retreat. The other admirer, looking through the window, takes in the situation and on being presented to the motley crowd, makes himself agreeable in every way, much to the satisfaction of the girl, who thinks she has discovered his true worth and loves her for herself alone. Her mind is not disabused and she is won on the spot.

ECLAIR.

THE CONNECTING LINK (Aug. 14).—Here we find a husband, a father of a beautiful child, who grows tired of his wife through the attractiveness of another and younger woman. So deeply does he become enmeshed in the snares of the latter that he blindly abandons the wife, even though she is ill and in want.

The child's intuition, coupled with her great love for her parents, enables her to eventually bring about a happy re-union and saves her father. Cunningly, in the final scene, she contrives to have him present his wife with the same bouquet of flowers intended for the other woman.

AMBROSIO.

IF ONE COULD SEE INTO THE FUTURE (Aug. 2).—A young mother loses her little son and seeks to recover him from the hands of death. The pitying angel of life guides her through storm and over obstacles, until at last she stands in the presence of the Grim Reaper and passionately pleads with him to restore her loved one. For answer he shows her a marvelous spring, in whose limpid depths the future can be seen, and the life of the boy, as ordained by Fate, is shown to the mother. The youth is shown arriving at manhood and becoming involved in disgraceful difficulties, which lead to his suicide. Death then stops the clock of life and asks the mother if she would have her son fulfill such a life. She replies, "No!" and ceases her pleadings.

astery and achieves success in the big city, meeting the girl and marrying her. The traveler returns and in a sensational scene denounces the monk, and the girl learns for the first time of his broken vows. In a terrific conflict of emotions she prays for guidance, and commands him to go back to the monastery. A pathetic parting takes place, and the final scenes show her, four years later, with her baby girl saying her evening prayers, and the monk praying to heaven in his cell, his face illumined by the soft moonbeams falling through the tiny window.

YANKEE.

KATHLEEN MAVOURNEEN (Aug. 7).—A young squire has fallen in love with the pretty daughter of one of his tenants. Unfortunately he has never been able to declare his love to the pretty Irish lass for lack of opportunity.

While visiting among his tenants with his sister, they come to the home of the girl's parents and the young squire makes the best of this opportunity, declares his love, and asks the pretty colleen to become his wife. Although flattered by the offer of the young squire, the lass hesitates about accepting, as she loves and is beloved by a handsome Irish lad of her village. Being undecided, she asks the squire for time and assures him of her answer on the morrow. The squire returns to his home and writes a note to the colleen, stating that he will call the following day for his answer.

As the girl is perusing the epistle and pondering over the dilemma she falls asleep.

She dreams that she has married the squire and that he has grown tired of her; he has even gone so far as to hire assassins to waylay and murder her. The timely arrival of her former sweetheart and his heroic battle with the hired assassins saves her from this violent death.

The young squire meeting his wife and her former sweetheart becomes insanely jealous. He is about to kill her when her former sweetheart begins a desperate struggle and accidentally kills the young squire. Soldiers passing that way come upon the scene and place the Irish lad under arrest for the murder of the squire. The lad is condemned to death and the day is set for his execution. The girl then realizes how great her love is for the poor Irish lad and also that her marriage to the squire was a great mistake. She visits the lad in his cell on the last day and as he is led forth to the execution she falls in a faint.

She wakes from this horrible dream sobbing bitterly, and makes up her mind as to the proper answer to give to the squire. When the squire calls on the following day she introduces him to the Irish lad who has been her sweetheart for years and thanking the squire for the honor of his proposal, assures him that she would rather be the wife of the Irish lad, whom she loved.

The squire takes his defeat manfully and makes the happy couple a substantial wedding present sufficient to give them a start in life.

GREY WOLF'S SQUAW (Aug. 11).—Grey Wolf, a young Indian brave, falls in love with the daughter of the chief of the Sioux tribe and after presenting the chief with horses and blankets he obtains the young Indian maid, Blue Bird, as his squaw.

Blue Bird is not pleased with her father's choice of a husband, and at night when Grey Wolf is asleep she quietly steals away, taking with her the horses, and returns to her tribe. The crafty chief is pleased to see his daughter, as she may be the means of bringing him many more blankets and horses.

Grey Wolf, upon awakening, discovers his loss and determines to gain possession of his squaw as well as his horses. He appears before the chief and demands his property. The chief has him beaten and thrown from the camp. Smarting from the injustice, he appears at night when the entire camp is asleep and stealing into the tent of Blue Bird, drags her forth and escapes in a canoe. While being pursued by other Indians in a canoe he gives battle and after overturning the canoe of his pursuers makes his way safely to his own tent.

Blue Bird cannot but admire the bravery of the man who fought her, and seeing how he overcame every obstacle in order to obtain possession of her, she learns to love him, and cheerfully accompanies him to his tent as his bride.

BILL DOES HIS OWN WASHING (Aug. 4).—In the first place, Bill quarrels with his laundress, and resolves for the future to do his own washing. Accordingly he commences operations in the bedroom, but soon finds that the space is too limited. He then tries a street hose, which promises well until the attendant comes up and wrathfully turns it upon poor Bill himself. A street tap and a restaurant table lead to no better results, and, as usual, William is severely chastised on all sides. At last, however, he finds peace in a tub on the river, which offers opportunities for washing on a Napoleonic scale, and we witness the pleasing spectacle of Bill, sublimely happy, seated in a plunging barrel, surrounded by his dirty linen. But his joy is always transitory, and it is not long before the frail craft is boarded by a large dog, who effectually upsets everything. Bill finally clambers ashore, collects what is left of the ill-starred washing, and hastens to make his peace with the laundress, in whom he finds after all, he must put his trust.

AN ELOPEMENT BY AEROPLANE (Aug. 4).—Hetty is a young lady with an imperious uncle, who will not countenance the suit of Jack, her lover. So strongly does he resent the latter's attentions that he looks up his ward in her room and will let no one come near. But Jack conveys a note to Hetty, saying that he proposes to fetch her by aeroplane, and bidding her make preparations. The scenes which follow, showing the approach of the flying machine and the subsequent elopement of the lovers, are very exciting and are excellently managed. A final picture shows the outraged uncle dancing in impotent wrath at the trick which has been played upon him.

WHEN RUBEN CAME TO TOWN (Aug. 2).—Young Miss Ray, a winsome country lass, married to an old millionaire, with a big elaborate house on Fifth Avenue, New York City, becomes lonesome and pines for her own people. She accordingly sends for her country Aunt and cousin and asks them to visit her. The Aunt arrives and brings in tow the gawky country boy, Osca. Fearing that he will disgrace her, she gives him strict orders to imitate his Aunt's husband's every move at the table. This he accordingly does to the amazement and chagrin of the husband. The dining-room scene is an uproar from start to finish. The husband finally becomes wise and then the fun begins. Seeing that Osca imitates his every movement he immediately starts all sorts of ridiculous actions and culminates his antics when he tips back in his chair and Osca, following his actions, does the same, loses his balance and finding himself going over backwards, grabs the table cloth and brings the whole thing down with him.

Osca succeeds in getting himself into all sorts of scrapes and after a short stay, during which time he keeps the entire household in an uproar he is shipped off to the country where they all decide he certainly belongs.

THE MASCOT OF TROOP "C" (Aug. 4).—Golden haired little Buster, a sturdy, manly lad of eight, is mascot of troop "C," 15th Cavalry. The men all idolize Buster and vie with one another in winning his affection. Among Buster's most cherished possessions is an old donkey, "Jennie," which has been given by the men, and a little two-wheeled cart. Driving through the post one day Buster comes across a fair haired little maiden, whose name is May, who accompanied by her uncle, an officer, is out for a stroll. Buster is much impressed with the little girl, and his interest is appareutly reciprocated. Later at guard mount they again meet and he promises to show her his donkey. Buster gallantly invites his lady fair for a ride.

Immensely interested they drive farther away from the post than safety justifies and are captured by a prowling band of Indians. Taken by the Indians into their village the children are thrust into a wigwam for the night. Buster, however, manages to escape under the cover of darkness, mounting one of the Indian ponies, and hastens back to the post for aid. Troop "C" responds to the appeal of their mascot and with Buster at their head are soon on their way to the rescue. They quickly reach the Indian village, a thrilling fight ensues, which results in victory for the troop and the rescue of Buster's little friend.

THE END OF THE TRAIL (Aug. 2).—It was only a lovers' quarrel, and had Marion but received Tom's flowers and note, begging forgiveness, all would have gone well. Unfortunately, this was just what Neal Emory suspected; so, hurrying to the girl's home, he waited until the florist's boy appeared, then, quickly taking possession of the flowers, he threw the roses where Tom could not enter the house without seeing them. This done, he waited anxiously for the young man's appearance. Then, as he approached, Neal quickly bent over Marion, making the other think that he had been embracing the girl.

Wounded to the quick, Tom picked up the scorned flowers and turned sadly away. The following morning, Neal was delighted to receive a note from his rival stating that he had already started for the West. Neal made straight for Marion's home, where, just as he had planned, the girl's foolish pride not only made her accept him then and there, but also promised to be married at once.

Two years had scarcely passed ere Neal had grown tired of his young wife. Being out of work, and reading in the evening paper of Tom's success, Neal determined to write his old friend that he intended joining him in the West. Accordingly, after mailing Tom a letter, in which he stated that Marion had died, the husband packed up his belongings and stole quietly out—that his wife was penniless ,and already the landlord was clamoring for the rent. Neal cared not. She could take the baby and go back to her friends.

Upon his arrival West, Neal was greeted with hearty good-fellowship by his friend, and the two men were on their way to Tom's cabin, when they encountered a band of hostile Indians. An exciting chase followed, in which the white men gained the shelter of the cabin, to return the Redskins' fire. Neal was mortally wounded. Tom, however, was saved by the prompt arrival of the boys from an adjoining ranch. Knowing that he had but a few moments to live, Neal brokenly confessed his deception before his marriage, and, that his wife still lived.

Tom immediately started for the East, arriving just in time to keep the woman he loved from being turned out into the street, and later, to bring her out to his own glorious West.

MUTT AND JEFF GET PASSES TO THE BALL GAME (Aug. 5).—"Well, this is one game I won't miss, anyway!" says Mutt; and away he goes to the nearest department store for a new pair of "mitt covers." After securing the desired article, he saunters up the street until he comes to a show window, in which is seen a most beautiful "model" in full length, displaying "the latest" in Paris fashions. Mutt becomes so enamored that he cannot resist telling her, or IT, so. While thus deeply engaged, a newsboy runs up and cries, "Paper, mister?" "Why, cert," says Mutt, "Give me the baseball extra!" Again he turns to the model in the window, while the newsboy is trying to make change for the last piece of coin in Mutt's possession. Seeing his chance, the newsboy "beats it."

"Hey, kid! the change—I need it!" cries Mutt as he chases the fleeing newsie. The "kid," however, is too far away to hear.

"Something's got to be done now!" soliloquizes Mutt. "I know what: I'll work a phoney ticket I just can't miss seeing that game. Besides, if I can't go—Jeff can't; so I'll get his "goat."

Little Jeff comes along very much downcast and also speaks of the great game he cannot see. Quickly Mutt exhibits his "phoney," saying, "It's only a professional courtesy of the sporting editor." His bluff goes for all it's worth until he departs, leaving poor little Jeff to think over the matter, which results in Jeff coming to the conclusion, "Maybe the sporting editor will give me one, too, if I tell him that Mutt sent me!" So away he goes to the sporting editor's office, where after some great difficulty, he finally comes into possession of a real pass to the ball game, the editor not being able to make use of it.

Later, on meeting Mutt, Jeff says, "I got a pass, too—now, we can go together." Mutt realizes that Jeff has "put it over" on him, and taking up a big broadaxe, he chases pool little Jeff down five flights of fire-escapes, through many streets, and is just about to captnre and perhaps annihilate him, when a passing street car comes to the rescue. Jeff gets aboard and lands safely in front of the ball park, just in time for the game. What becomes of poor old Mutt? Oh, he's still running!

CHAMPION.

DEWEY (Aug. 7).—The wonderful achievements of George Dewey in defying mines and batteries to enter Manila Bay, there to annihilate the whole Spanish fleet at that station, was the talk of the world, and the putting of such a hero, fittingly into a film story is well worth the commendable enterprise.

As we see here the illustrious Dewey in situations where his patriotism shines forth, we behold those truly transcendental qualities of his personality which made him great. But this picture is not merely a biographical projection, but deals with other factors and incidents of the Spanish War period.

Mark Hanna and Theodore Roosevelt play important rols in the story unfolded, which is remarkable not only for the personages it contains, but for the curious incidents which are interwoven. Into the weft and woof of historical fact, there is woven a beautiful color—a color of heart interest, that grips us in an evertightening embrace and there are also paeches of brightness in that color—humor we may call it—bright, keen, unconscious, Irish humor—that makes us dealize how precious bumor is, as an offset to the gripping intensity of the other situations.

The bursting of a mine in the path of the Irish despatch bearer in his great death ride through the enemy's lines may be mentioned as one of these tense moments to which we have reference.

CHIEF FIRE EYE'S GAME (Aug. 9).—Gerald wasn't a bad sort, by any means. He was a big, handsome fellow and liked by everyone. There wasn't a cowpuncher for miles around who would not go through fire and water for him; but whenever Gerald had any fire-water in him, he would do as he pleased, and allow no one to help him. At such a time, he was gambling with a couple of greasers, and they were raking in pot after pot, and Gerald's load of "peaches" was getting heavier and heavier. Nor would he stop at the behest of friends and the game went on.

An old Indian Chief had become an interested spectator of the game as it progressed. His eyes glistened instinctively with the gambler's spirit. With ever increasing fascination he bent over Gerald's chair, watching the cards as they were played or dealt. In no pleasant mood, Gerald roughly pushed him aside. The chief took no umbrage at this, but on the contrary appealed to the man, thus delivering himself: "Me big chief, learn how play, you teach me?"

But he only met with a rebuff and a blow, and when he unconsciously drew back in an attitude which bespoke resentment, a dozen guns were levelled at him and his companion. But Gerald interfered at this, and the bartender ejected the big chief. The latter laid his savage plans.

Shortly after, Gerald was cleaned out of all his cash; all the others in the saloon had departed, leaving him "alone in his glory," and so it came about that he flung himself on a couch near the window and was soon snoring in a profound slumber. Back came the Indians, the chief with several others, and Gerald was kidnapped.

The discovery was soon made, and the cowboys being informed, dashed madly away in pursuit. The trail led them to the Indian camp and one of the boys climbed a tree. He saw them wildly dancing about their victim with fiendish gesticulations. But—what's this? The line of redskins opens ,and there sits Gerald, on a blanket with the big chief, teaching him how to play cards.

THE ARTIST FINANCIER (Aug. 3).—Mr. Reynold sends for an artist from town to paint his daughter's portrait. He comes, he paints, he conquers. One day, as she is sitting for him, and he is translating on the canvas with the aid of his colors, the beauty and the natural color of herself, Cupid enters the scene and paints a picture of his own—a picture of youth and love and springtime. The father sees the young people together just a bit too much, and divines the secret. He forbids the artist the house, and refuses to let his daughter see him.

A certain Mr. Bell, however, invented the telephone, and soon many ardent messages click over the wires. At a certain time each day she stands at a window, and he passes and gets a glimpse of his goddess. On one of these daily visits to the grounds, he sees a surveyor at work on the estate, and in passing, glances through the surveyor's glass. Astonished, he sees the house as though he were looking through a field-glass. At once a happy thought occurs to him. He can arrange to have the girl stand on the porch at an appointed hour each day and with the aid of a surveyor's outfit, finish the uncompleted portrait. The next telephnoe conversation is a weighty one, details are arranged and thereafter daily, with glass and easel, he works on the long distance portrait.

One day, however, Miss Reynold does not appear. Instead, come her father and another, who point down the road and talk. The artist, through his deaf-mute sister, has mastered lip-reading, and can tell what they are saying by the movement of their lips. Reynold tells the other, apparently an engineer, that the railroad is to go along the lines pointed out by him, and must pass through Eagle Pass to get to the mountains. The artist suddenly exhibits a bit of commercial instinct that would do justice to the old financier himself. He goes to the farmers holding land at Eagle Pass, and buys an option on the land for a year. Then he just waits.

The expected result follows. Reynold goes to the farmers to arrange for the purchase of the land, and in every case is told that the young artist holds the option. Dumbfounded, he wonders how it is that the artist just owns the very land he wants, but at last he is forced to go to him and make terms. The artist, remembering the unfairness of the other's treatment to himself, names a steep figure for the land and Reynold is forced to accept. Then the youth tells him how he came to learn the secret, and the financier, marvelling at the newly-discovered commercial ability possessed by the artist, tells him he has enough business tact and foresight to marry a financier's daughter, and that his business startegy will be an asset to the family.

THE BURGLAR AND THE GIRL (Aug. 5).—The opening scenes show a burglary being perforemd by a burglar, a member of the "swell mob." Though detectives are put on the scent, it is a very long while before they get a clue, so well has the thief covered his tracks. He establishes himself in society, and succeeds in becoming the fiancé of a banker's daughter. Eventually a detective arrives with a bag of safe-opening tools belonging to the thief, and denounces him. Before being taken away to justice, his sweetheart, oblivious of everything, bestows upon him one last embrace.

Among the Exhibitors

De Soto, Mo.—F. R. Dean, former manager of the Gem Theater and present manager of the Airdome in De Soto, Mo., has leased the Jefferson Theater in that city and will open the said theater about Sept. 1, 1911. Stock, repertoire, vaudeville and high class moving pictures will play the house this season. The Jefferson Theater is the largest and best equipped in southeast Missouri, seating capacity 1,100.

Fairmount, W. Va.—The Belle-Olendorf & Ballard Amusement Company, of Pittsburg, Kan., have made arrangements for the erection, in this city next summer, of an airdome. It will have a seating capacity of 2,000. The company at present operates 30 airdomes.

South Bend, Ind.—J. W. Himebaugh, former owner of the Royal Theater, has acquired of Thomas Moss, a lease of the Indiana Theater on South Michigan Street. Mr. Moss, who also disposed of the American Scenic Theater at the same time Mr. Himebaugh sold the Royal, will continue to devote his entire attention to his remaining playhouse, the Majestic Theater.

Pittsfield, Mass.—John F. Cooney, proprietor of the World in Motion in this city, is in Housatonic, where he is negotiating for the lease of a building in that town, for the purpose of running a moving picture theater there.

Bowling Green, Ky.—A new moving picture show has been opened here, having for its quarters the new Columbia Theater. J. P. Masters, of Memphis, has been made manager.

Allentown, Pa.—A. J. Roberts, of Coplay, who for some time conducted a moving picture theater at Coplay, has closed his place of business. He has secured a lease on a theater at Kutztown.

Slatington, Pa.—Messrs. Adam Sauerwine and his brother Raymond, have rented the Bijou Moving Picture Theater on Lower Main Street, from M. Handwerk.

New York City.—A. A. Corn has opened an airdome with motion pictures and songs at 135th Street and Broadway, under the name of the Acorn Amusement Park. Licensed pictures are used, and with a seating capacity of 1,500, he expects to do a record business.

Dayton, Ohio.—Architects Gerber & Lott, U. B. Building, have prepared plans for a new moving picture theater, with seating capacity of about 550, to be erected on the east side of Jefferson Street, adjoining the Natural Gas Company for the Pictures Company of America, composed of foreign capital, we are advised. This new amusement house will be devoted to vaudeville and motion pictures and be known as the Majestic. The cost of this building will run between $30,000 and $35,000.

Cincinnati, Ohio.—Plans for a new moving picture theater at McMicken Avenue and Mohawk place, were filed with the Building Commissioner by the National Theater company. The seating capacity is to be 700.

Whitewater, Wis.—The Peoples Theater opened and is being well patronized. The place is on Main Street and is finely equipped with opera seats. The proprietors are M. I. Sapiro and E. H. Ericsson.

Milwaukee, Wis.—H. C. Hensel is drawing plans for an electric moving picture theater, to be erected at Sixth and Greenfield Avenues. It will cost about $8,000. Architect W. L. Hess is taking bids for a moving picture theater to be erected at Twenty-seventh Street and Lisbon Avenue, for the West Side Amusement Company. It will be 40 by 116 feet, of brick construction with composition roofing and ornamental plaster interior finish. The auditorium will have cement floor, with marbel wainscoting and tile floor in the vestibule and a terra cotta front. It will cost $10,000.

Duluth, Minn.—Plans for the alterations of the Sunbeam Theater, on West Superior Street, are now being prepared by Vernon J. Price, architect. A balcony is to be put in, and the front will be changed. The specifications will be ready next week when bids will be called for.

Sheboygan, Wis.—A new moving picture theater, to be called The Pastime, is to be opened in about three weeks, at 1012 Michigan avenue.

Birmingham, Ala.—A new vaudeville and picture show theater is being built at the corner of Green and Eustis Streets, by L. S. Sugg, on his property, the old Calhoun place.

Trenton, N. J.—One of the largest moving picture houses in Trenton will be opened by Robinson Brothers next Saturday afternoon, at South Broad and Dye Streets.

Pittsburg, Pa.—A new moving picture show has opened in 319 to 321 Fifth Avenue.

Cincinnati, Ohio.—Plans for a new moving picture theater at McMicken Avenue and Mohawk Place, were filed with Building Commisioner Kuhlmann, by the National Theater Company. The seating capacity is to be 700.

Dayton, Wash.—L. R. Carlisle, who has been lessee of the Weinhard Theater the last year, has sold his interest, including stage property and moving pictures, to R. J. Neal, who will continue to operate it with the same, but better policy.

Topeka, Kan.—A new moving picture house, to cost $4,000, is being fitted up in the vacant building owned by Gordon Bros., at 402-402½ Kansas Avenue. It is to be opened September 1. The front of the building will be torn out and a new one built. The exterior is to be finished in expeusive gilt mouldings, and will present one of the finest picture theater fronts in Topeka.

New Orleans, La.—New Orleans will shortly boast of the largest photoplay house in the South, an addition to the Pierce string of theaters. It will be located in Canal Street, between Carondelet and Baronne, in the building formerly occupied by the Schwartz dry goods store. More than $20,000 will be spent by the Pierce Amusement Company in remodeling the old Schwartz building.

Knoxville, Tenn.—The new Horton Theater, on Jackson Street, which will be known as the "Picto," will probably be ready for occupancy the first of next week. This is a concrete building and was erected by Horton Bros., and is modern in every respect. It will seat 400 people.

Atlanta, Ga.—Another moving pictnre theater will be opened on Whitehall Street. For this purpose A. S. Adams, of B. M. Grant & Co., has leased to W. M. Slicer, for a term of three years, 98 Whitehall Street.

Allentown, Pa.—H. F. Hartman, proprietor of the Keystone Theater, has purchased the Lyric Theater, at Northampton, for S. B. Walker.

Philadelphia, Pa.—L. W. Burton has rented the store formerly occupied by D. C. Taylor & Co., and will begin at once to install a moving pictnre show. He will, in all probability, be ready to open up to the public the first of next week.

Johnston, Ill.—The Pastime Theater is now under new management, and will be conducted on a high order.

Birmingham, Ala.—The Best Airdome opened with over 1000 attendance the first night, this being something new for the picture people of Birmingham. Manager Linhart is giving them two reels of first-run picturea.

Milwaukee, Wis.—A new motion picture house at Twenty-seventh Street and Lisbon Avenue, will be erected by the West Side Amusement Co. The building will cost $10,000, according to specifications. Frank Buemmer is taking bids for a motion picture house at Eleventh Avenue and Washington Street to be erected by the Buemmer estate. According to plans the theater will seat 650 people and will cost about $10,000.

Cincinnati, Ohio.—William E. Brown, owner of a motion picture house at 2316 Vine Street, just north of Calhoun, will enlarge that playhouse in order to keep step with opposition. It was announced that the Empire Theater Co. would build in the block next south, between McMillan and Calhoun Streets, where a vacant lot now exists. Brown's theater now contains 100 seats, and when the changes are completed he will have a total of 300 chairs. The plans are being made by Architects Stewart & Stewart. Moving pictures will be featured here.

Eau Claire, Wis.—The Unique Theater, on interior of which work is going on, is to be ready for occupancy probably by or before the middle of August.

St. Louis, Mo.—The E. H. Pipe Realty Co., which is building a picture theater on the north side of Olive Street, between Vandeventer Avenue and Sarah Street, recorded a lease on the theater to the Olive Theater Co. for twenty-five years at $2,000 a year.

Indianapolis, Ind.—Charles Mahan, who came here from Portland, Ore., and bought a half interest in the Lyric Theater, has sold his interest to Hugh Mosman and will place a modern theater in the John Meyer building.

Marinette, Wis.—The Cozy, the name of the new moving picture theater on Hall Avenne, will open this evening with an excellent program. The interior of the little theater is very handsome, and will comfortably seat 300 people.

Red Cloud's Secret

Scene from RED CLOUD'S SECRET

An Indian, who all his life has been imposed upon and bullied by the boys of the Bar X ranch, suddenly finds a friend in a young clergyman, who has come West for health. In gratitude the red skin gives the secret of a mine rich in gold.

How the mine was gallantly defended against the schemes of the designing bully, and how his good fortune won for the clergyman a pretty bride, is most interestingly portrayed in this excellent film.

AMONG THE EXHIBITORS.

Marinette, Wis.—The Cozy is the name of the new moving picture theater on Hall Avenue, which is now open. It is a very handsome looking theater, seating 300 people.

Wabash, Ind.—J. L. Washburn has closed a deal whereby John Brookins and Fred Wygrant, of North Manchester, become the owners of the Lyceum Theater of this city.

Pittsburg, Pa.—The owners of the new picture theater on Fifth Avenue, between Wood and Smithfield Streets, advertised, offering prizes for a suitable name for the house. The contest has now ended and the name selected is "Minerva."

East Stroudsburg, Pa.—The Airdome Theater had an auspicious opening, with fully 1,200 people witnessing the opening performance. Albert E. Eckert is manager of the show.

Suffern, N. Y.—P. B. Lespinasse has broken ground for a new airdome.

Milwaukee, Wis.—William Schoenleber has been granted a permit to erect a $9,000 moving picture theater at West Twenty-fourth and Vliet Streets.

St. Louis, Mo.—One of the most imposing of the many moving picture houses in South St. Louis will be erected at the southwest corner of Nebraska and Park Avenues.

Centerville, Md.—Manager Gilbert, of the Arlington Summer Garden, has completed arrangements for exhibiting motion pictures every evening.

Eugene, Ore.—The Potter Willoughby Amusement Company will open a moving picture theater in Springfield.

Chickaska, Okla.—J. W. Martin and David Hill are the new owners of the Chickaska Airdome, having purchased the same from Wubker Avery.

Louisville, Ky.—Derr Brothers, of Indianapolis, have secured a ten-year lease on the Hays property, on the south side of Market Street, near Fourth Street. The building will be remodeled and a handsome moving picture theater will shortly be opened therein.

Hancock, Mich.—Max Fischer of this city, has received the plans for the new moving picture theater he will erect upon his Quincy Street property for Ben Gettleman, manager of the Savoy.

Vincennes, Ind.—Dave Padgett has named his new theater, on North Second Street, the Rex.

Philadelphia, Pa.—Harry Brockelhurst will build a $15,000 moving picture theater on the northeast corner of Erie Avenue and Marshall Street, for the Erie Amusement Company.

Rockland, Me.—Work on the new Empire Theater in Oak Street, is rapidly progressing. It will have a seating capacity of 600. Fred M. Eugley will be the manager.

Watertown, Wis.—The Empire Theater has changed hands. The former owner, H. Davis, has sold the playhouse to A. B. Avendson, of Chicago, for $12,000.

Avalon, Cal.—The Aerotorium moving picture theater is now open and is drawing large crowds.

Shreveport, La.—Messrs. Barber and Wardlaw have gone into partnership and will open an airdome for the colored people in the park near the Union depot.

Seven Exhibitors Have Taken Advantage of Hallberg's Recent Exchange Offer of New Moving Picture Machines for Old—Fall in Line

The "Hallberg Economizer" Not Only Saves two-thirds on your Electric Bill, but improves your light 100%. It speaks for itself, but others also speak for the "Hallberg." Read the following:

Pasadena, Cal., July 18, 1911.

MR. J. H. HALLBERG:

Dear Sir—As I have accepted a position where two of your "Economizers" are in use, I desire to have some literature on same, including wiring diagrams. My experience of your machines is limited to a few weeks, but in that short time I came to the conclusion that there is "Nothing like the Hallberg Economizer." Hoping to hear from you in the near future, I am,

Mr. Exhibitor:

FOR the past two months we have been telling you of our plans of operation for the NATIONAL PROGRAMME. We have impressed upon you the wonderful possibilities of EXCLUSIVE SERVICE. We know that you have been impressed with our proposition, by the mere fact that since our first "Ad" went to press we have received from the Exhibitors throughout the United States thousands of letters complimenting us on the theory of EXCLUSIVENESS and encouraging us greatly in our work. We want to take this opportunity to thank you for the encouragement you have given us. "Patience is a virtue," and we beg of you to be patient for just a few weeks longer. At that time the IDEAL of the Exhibitor will have been realized. The National Exclusive Programme will have been launched and we trust and hope that at that time when you are approached by a National Exchange that your interest is as great as it has been in the past and that you will show your willingness to give the Programme the support you promised by contracting for Service from them.

We promise you QUALITY in every foot we release. This, combined with EXCLUSIVENESS, must carry us as well as yourselves to the front ranks.

Our representatives have just returned from Europe with exclusive contracts to represent the following European manufacturers:

OVER AND OVER AGAIN—
You know the line from one of the song-hits of the day. OVER AND OVER AGAIN you will say that is a film that—well, you know pictures are more illustrative than word-paintings. You will have to see the picture to realize that it combines as extraordinary playing, plot and picture personality as only REX can put into a film. The traditional impecunious artist develops a bit of commercial strategy that captivates his unwillingly-prospective father-in-law, and that will captivate you and your audience.

"THE ARTIST FINANCIER"

"THE ARTIST FINANCIER"
will show you how to increase your box-office receipts.

EDISON FILMS

TUESDAY, AUGUST 8TH.

THE BATTLE OF BUNKER HILL

United States History Series Number 3.

CAST.

George Washington, Commander and Chief ..... Mabel Trunnelle
Colonel William Prescott ..... Guy Coombs
Jack, a Continental Officer ... Frank McGlynn
His Bride ..... Charles Ogle

"This was the first regular battle between the British and the Americans, and to the latter their defeat, if defeat it might be called, had the effect of a triumph."
Washington Irving.

An interesting story embodying the above celebrated battle, of great pictorial beauty.

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 9TH.

THE ADVENTURES OF A BABY

On one reel.

CAST.

The Bachelor ..... William Bechtel
His Niece ..... Marie Tener

A young mother, a bachelor uncle who hates babies and a mix-up at a railroad station leaving the mother minus a baby and the uncle with one he doesn't know what to do with. A very funny farce.

THE STOLEN DOG

CAST.

The owner of the dog ..... Edward Boulden
An innocent purchaser ..... Richard Ridgeley
The Tramp ..... William West

Another "tramp" story and a good one. Short but very much to the point.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 11TH.

THE SPIRIT OF THE GORGE

CAST.

The Indian Chief ..... James Gordon
Kewanee, a young warrior ..... Richard Neil Ouchita, his daughter .. Rolinda Bainbridge
His Rival ..... Herbert Prior
The Medicine Man ..... Frank McGlynn

An Indian romance of a young Indian warrior who risks his life in treacherous rapids to rescue a maiden who had previously spurned him. An unusually thrilling story with scenes of great beauty.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 12TH.

FRIDAY THE THIRTEENTH

or, "Just Like the Gaytons," by Chas. Battell Loomis.

CAST.

Mr. Gayton ..... William Bechtel
Mrs. Gayton ..... Miriam Nesbitt

The humor of the original is well carried out. Mr. and Mrs. Gayton are a delightful pair, always getting into trouble, but never losing their temper.

From the Patrons View Point

What Causes People

to continually patronize one Picture Theatre in preference to another? Of course, location, appearances, films, etc. have a great deal to do with it, but quality of the picture is what builds up a steady patronage that makes the business profitable.

This depends largely on your light and if you are using any other device than a to step down your current you are not getting best results.

With our machine you can produce a clear, white, steady light that won't worry your "house" by continuous flickering and will surprise you with the difference it makes with the films.

It is the only device that can be changed instantly to any of the three intensities without breaking the circuit between adjustments.

But this is not all. We will guarantee that our Compensarc

Will Cut 65% from Your Light Bill and we'll send you one on 30 days' free trial to prove it.

We have a little 22 page booklet that explains all the reasons why If you want a better light at ⅓ your present cost, send for it today. It's free.

KEEP YOUR DRUM HEADS DRY

The very nature of drum heads causes them to absorb moisture readily, and when the heads become damp it is an absolute certainty that your drum will lose its brilliancy.

Our latest invention, the Electric Drum Heater, entirely overcomes this difficulty, for by its use you can keep your drum brilliant and snappy regardless of the weather.

This device can be attached to any drum and the connecting plug will fit any ordinary 110-volt incandescent lamp socket. It gives no light; never burns out; may be turned on and off at will, or if desired, entirely removed in a few seconds time. Entire outfit, including the Heater proper, two connecting plugs, and six feet of cord, weighs eight ounces—the Heater but two. It is practically indestructible and can easily be carried in your drum case.

Be sure and say whether you wish it for Snare Drum, Bass Drum, or Tympani, as each instrument requires a different strength.

Try one—your money back if you are not entirely satisfied

WHAT NEXT!

Mr. Picture Man;

Do you want to fill your house with the "ohs" and "ahs" of an admiring audience? Put an artistic touch to your pictures by installing a new tinting device. Listen—this is what it will do: If you are using a 30 day or older film service it will reduce the "rain" and like imperfections 40%. It will make all plain films doubly artistic in any tint to suit your fancy. If you want to "stretch" your show it will permit of a less than normal speed without an increase of "flicker." It will produce the common black and white films in either solid hues or in shaded effects. It will not require extra amperage on any ordinary throw. Only three or four scenes of the Biograph masterpiece, "Enoch Arden," are toned or tinted. If you had installed this device before projecting that subject you could have added to the beauty of those distant marines with a "sunset" or a "twilight" effect. Imagine some of those tropical scenes in a "moonlight" or a rich sepia or olive shade. It will produce these and a dozen other combinations with but a touch of the fingers. So simple that a four-year-old can operate it.

These effects are not obtained with the old style tinting wheel and celluloid color sheets. Nothing to burn, shrivel or scorch in THIS attachment. The trade is crying for "more tinted films." Secure this unique device and ALL your films will be tinted. Attachable to any machine. Single device assorted tints only. olives, pinks, "moonlights," etc, $2.75. Double device for producing solid tints or artistic shaded effects also, $3.75. By express only.

Cash with order. My reference, First National Bank. Address

Or Jerusalem Delivered

(Copyright 1911, World's Best Film Co.) Will be Protected by the New Copyright Law

And if you don't get all your investment back in much less than a year's time it will be your own fault! You have every opportunity to clean up a fortune. First, if you buy State rights to this magnificent film production, you have the best moving picture in the world and no possible competition in the State or States you own! In the second place, we are taking all worries and cares off your shoulders with regard to the necessary posters, circulars, dodgers, lectures, banners and streamers! You don't have to hurry your bookings. If you own State rights, you can take your own sweet time about booking the picture! For 28 years your INCOME from this one feature is protected against everybody and everything!

IN FIXING PRICES FOR STATE RIGHTS

we have determined to ask just about HALF what we think we ought to get for such a wonderful picture production. We have purposely made the prices ridiculously, sensationally LOW, so that you can make big money and thus look to us hereafter for good things. We are going to sell all State rights as speedily as we can, and our LOW PRICES ARE GOING TO TURN THE TRICK! If you are interested, take action quick! We are already negotiating with various individuals and companies in nearly every State. It looks like the quickest selling of State rights on record. Don't let this opportunity slip by without at least a try at it. SEE THE PICTURE and you will become wildly enthusiastic about it. SEE THE PICTURE and you will agree that at the prices we ask it is the GRANDEST BARGAIN and BIGGEST SNAP ever thrown on the market. It means an income IMMEDIATELY and for years thereafter. All you take in after the first few months will be VELVET. Exhibitors everywhere are wild to book it. They are flooding us with inquiries, asking who owns the rights in their States. The DEMAND is already created. We've done your work for you. What are YOU going to do about it?

Can This Be True?

Nobody Loves A Fat Woman

Whether this actually or always applies, is a debatable point, but after seeing the picture you can see why our fat lady felt it did. Poor Fatty!—no one had any use for her, she figured. But she was wrong. SOMEBODY had. BUT IT WASN'T JACK, our hero! He had use for just one other girl in the entire wide world. So he naturally had no eyes for Fatty even though she was worth $50,000 to him. This, with a few real, funny misfortunes, decided her in the view that furnishes our title.

The Train Despatcher is a tale of the rail that has become a classic on the H. T. & D. Road, where the incidents all transpired. Very exciting incidents they were, too, with a pretty girl train de patcher taking the leading part in them She actually climbed a huge, swaying telegraph pole, managed to "tap the wire" and so averted a most terrible railroad disaster. All these thrilling things we show in the picture. The reel will be famous for the daring work of its chief character, the realistic wreck scenes and the fine "railroad atmosphere" throughout.

"TWO FLYING A COWBOY FEATURES"

Pauline Bush and Warren Kerrigan, in "Cattle, Gold and Oil."

Released this week, Monday, August 7th

"Cattle, Gold and Oil"

A quaint Western comedy drama, picturing a ranchman's experience in the purchase of a salted mine. The story unfolded in the film is full of interest, and the situations depicted extremely laughable. A Western feature in all that the name implies.

Released this week, Thursday, August 10th

"The Ranch Girl"

Featuring the rescue of Warren Kerrigan from the hands of outlaws, through the medium of his cow-pony. This rescue is startling and is a liberal education in the intelligence of the horse. The film is a thrilling one throughout its entire length. Just the class of production that the exhibitor requires during the hot summer months.

Arrange to obtain both of these films from your exchange to-day. All Independent Exchanges buy the Flying A product.

THE RULING PASSION

The Result of a Youngster's Visit to the Theatre

Little Billy has been taken to the theatre by his parents and as a result becomes stage-struck. At a children's party Billy plays stage manager and drills the children in some of the scenes he has witnessed. Later in the day while playing on the lawn the idea strikes him to play the drama with realism, so they go down to the shore and use a rowboat for a pirate ship, seizing his sister and placing her aboard. This is considered great, until the boat breaks from its mooring and little brother and sister are carried by the rough sea far out from the shore. As his parents are away on a visit to the city, it is some time before Billy can secure aid. Upon their return, papa, after an exciting sail in a motor boat rescues them.

Approximate Length 997 feet

RELEASED AUGUST 10th, 1911

THAT DARE DEVIL

Dan's sweetheart forces him to become a hero by pushing him into the park lake, into which a child has fallen. The water is shallow and Dan manages to drag the little one to the shore. For this deed he is rewarded by being made a copper. A brave cop he is, too, when it comes to chasing little boys. One day he goes to the lake shore and indulges in a plunge. The boys find his uniform, and stealing it away places the coat on the wharf. This leads to the impression that he gave his life to save another's and while they laud his apparent bravery, he is hiding in the bushes clothed only in a bathing suit.

Approximate Length 606 feet

AN INTERRUPTED GAME

Baxter, to get away to join the boys in a little game of cards, tells his wife that he is going to visit a sick friend. She gives him until ten o'clock. When he doesn't return she goes after him and consequently his friend has to play sick, receiving at the hands of Baxter's sympathetic wife mustard plasters, etc. For the time, the friend submits to the torture but "never again!" Approximate Length 392 feet

THE ARROW HEAD

This splendid Western story is particularly well acted. The plot is absorbingly interesting. Depicts the adventures of an Eastern family in the West including attack by Indians and the strange reuniting of the family after many years of captivity and wandering.

Length about 600 feet Split Reel Length about 400 feet

Home is Best After All

Here's a delicious comedy with a gently pathetic note. The old couple after a day in the city rejoice the more in the homely comfort of the farm.

THE AUTO BUG

Bud certainly was "bug" on automobiles. His adventures with an old car would make an Indian laugh. Bug Bud finally landed in the "bug house."
